

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

103 445

kansas city public library

kansas city, missouri

Books will be issued only on presentation of library card.

Please report lost cards and change of residence promptly.

Card holders are responsible for all books, records, films, pictures or other library materials checked out on their name.

MARIA LUIGI CARLO ZENOBI
SALVATORE CHERUBINI

Uniform with this Volume

HENRY PURCELL	By DR. W. H. CUMMINGS,
JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH	By REGINALD LANE POOLE,
GEORGE FREDERICK HANDEL	By MRS. JULIAN MARSHALL
JOSEPH HAYDN	By MISS TOWNSEND
WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART	By DR. F. GEHRING
LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN	By H. A. RUDALL
CARL MARIA VON WEBER	By SIR JULIUS BENEDICT
GIOACHINO ROSSINI	By H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS
FRANZ SCHUBERT	By H. F. FROST
FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY	By W. S. ROCKSTRO
ROBERT SCHUMANN	By J. A. FULLER MAITLAND
RICHARD WAGNER	By DR. FRANCIS HUEFFER
MARIA LUIGI CARLO ZENOBI SAL- VATORE CHERUBINI	By FREDERICK J. CROWEST
JOHANNES BRAHMS	By E. MARKHAM LEE

L. Cherubini

MARIA LUIGI CARLO ZENOBI SALVATORE CHERUBINI

1760 – 1842

BY
FREDERICK J. CROWEST

FORWORD BY
FRANCESCO BERGER
HON. R.A.M., F.G.S.M.

LONDON
SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN BY PURNELL AND SONS
PAULTON, SOMERSET, ENGLAND

PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENT

TAKE the light away from the skies, take the flowers off our earth, take the waves from the sea, and take Music out of our lives, and what is left ? A darkened world, a barren earth, a waste of stagnant water, saddened days and joyless nights.

Music, in one form or another,—whether learned or simple, vocal or instrumental, dramatic or lyrical, appeals to our entire race, and those who have spent their years in producing it for us, have contributed abundantly to the sum of human happiness. Acknowledging our indebtedness to them, it is but natural that we should wish to know something about the when, where, and how, of their activities.

This information the present series of biographies of Music's mighty Masters, supplies, in briefly-told volumes, full of reliable facts, with very little exaggeration or partisanship, and compiled by authors of highest standing, each with special qualification for his task.

The volumes are issued at the uniform price of 2s. 6d., and are obtainable from any bookseller in the Kingdom and Colonies.

The general editorship has been entrusted to Mr. Francesco Berger, Hon. R.A.M., F.G.S.M., whose extended experience has been of valuable service to us and whose ready help we gratefully acknowledge.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co., LTD.

CHERUBINI

CHERUBINI stands at the parting of the roads—the older from the newer, in music. He appears to have worthily closed that procession of great musicians, whom, for want of better definition, we conventionally speak of as “classic.”

While musicians of every type take off their hats to his name, his music has never been “popular” with the masses, who, at all times and in every land, prefer to be entertained rather than elevated.

Unlike most musicians of his rank, Cherubini’s fame is unconnected with any particular instrument, whether organ, piano, or violin. It rests on the far grander foundation of masses, symphonies and operas of masterly quality.

Musicians have occasionally been known, by their candid admiration, to arouse public interest in some particular favourite of theirs, or to add the lustre of their name to the ranks of worshippers at some recognised shrine. Mendelssohn was enthusiastic about Bach, and Saint-Saëns worshipped Mozart. What should be the attitude of the world to one whose genius evoked unqualified praise from a Haydn, a Beethoven, and a Mendelssohn?

Surely the day must soon dawn when Cherubini will come into his own, and tardy justice be done to a composer whom such illustrious contemporaries acknowledged as one of Music’s mighty Masters.

F. B.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
PREFACE	v
BIRTH AND PARENTAGE	1
UNDER SARTI	3
EARLIEST WORKS.	5
VISITS LONDON	6
Lodoïska	9.
Medée	14
Les Deux Journées	19
Faniska	28
BERLIOZ AND Ali Baba	32
CHERUBINI'S OVERTURES	41
A SACRED MUSIC COMPOSER	42
MASS, IN F	44
MASS, IN D MINOR	48
MASS, IN C [No. 6]	51
REQUIEM, IN C MINOR	55
REQUIEM, IN D MINOR	57
CHERUBINI'S PROLIFICNESS	61
AT CATEL'S GRAVE	62
DEATH, OBSEQUIES, AND CAREER	63
HIS INFLUENCE UPON MUSIC	69

	PAGE
ESTIMATE OF HIS DRAMATIC WORKS	69
ESTIMATE OF HIS SACRED MUSIC	77
HIS INFLUENCE AS A TEACHER	83
HIS TEMPERAMENT AND DISPOSITION	91
ANECDOTES OF CHERUBINI	96
CATALOGUE OF COMPOSITIONS	105
INDEX	111

CHERUBINI.

“THE last and noblest Roman in the purely classical style of Art,” as Baillot has styled Cherubini, was born at Florence on the 14th of September, 1760. The register of baptisms at St. John the Baptist Basilica, records the full name as Maria Luigi Carlo Zenobi Salvatore Cherubini—by no means an insignificant designation, and the more noticeable since the father was no other than an accompanist on the harpsichord at the Pergola Theatre; and who sheltered himself in a modest dwelling in not the most fashionable strada of the city.

Cherubini as a child was precocious. Before six summers had made play with him, his father had decided upon a musical future for his boy. He himself took Carlo in hand, and this with such good results, that at the age of ten years the little fellow could accompany figured basses, play easy pieces upon the harpsichord, and make a tolerable noise, for a child, upon the violin.

It is related that at about this early age Cherubini had made such progress with the violin that he was able to replace a violinist absent one evening from the Pergola theatre orchestra.

The paternal training, however, was soon changed for other more serious under Bartolomeo and Alessandro Felici, and after them Bizzarri, a singing master, and J. Castrucci, an organist. A short period of such tuition, and there came the boyish impulse to compose something. By 1773 a Mass in D—for four voices and instruments—was ready, and this was publicly performed at Florence, greatly to the delight of its young composer. Thus stimulated, the boy kept at work, and the following year brought to light a second Mass;¹ also a Cantata, entitled La Pubblica Felicità,² performed at a fête in honour of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who afterwards became Leopold II. Other compositions of these juvenile times were another Mass written in the key of C, for four voices, and with full score accompaniment;³ a setting of the Magnificat; an Oratorio performed in St. Peter's Church, Florence; and several minor works, scarcely of greater value now than as evidence of the earnest fashion in which young Cherubini was working, and of his exceptional power of handling voices and instruments along the subtle channels of theoretical art, even when he was a mere boy.⁴

La Pubblica Felicità brought Cherubini into notice.

¹ In C, for Four Voices, with full score accompaniments, 166 pp. MS.

² This Cantata is for several voices, and was first rendered in a side chapel of the Duomo.

³ 143 pp. MS.

⁴ Most of Cherubini's juvenile MSS. have become lost. Their composer always concealed them. Halévy, who withdrew them from secrecy, declares them to possess no sign of the genius which afterwards unveiled itself.

The Grand Duke—afterwards Emperor of Germany—had been pleased with the music, and on making inquiry as to the composer, had generously decided to send him to Bologna, in the hope that so promising a musician might have every opportunity afforded him for cultivating his talent. Accordingly Cherubini went to Bologna. This was in 1778, and he remained there four years, during which time he was fortunate enough to secure the training of the opera and mass composer—Sarti.

An extended tutelage with a master such as was Sarti could not fail to prove other than highly profitable to the zealous pupil, who, not puffed up with conceit concerning his acknowledged powers, was eager to lend himself to the most rigorous training. This was not always of the most agreeable character. Cherubini, for instance, was a youth with several rough corners in his character, and he failed to see the advantage of working in a dark and conventual chamber, with only a glimmering light from a lamp suspended from the ceiling—a stipulation upon which Sarti insisted, and which he used vehemently to declare was the only proper condition under which any great, or good, music could be composed! Nor could Cherubini easily reconcile himself to the practice of copying the scores of the old composers—a feature of study upon which Sarti placed great stress. The evident advantage of this labour, however, would appear to have manifested itself to Cherubini later on, since he continued to devote himself to copying, even when he had won fame as a composer; so much so indeed. that at the time of his death, and when his papers came to be examined, it was found that he had left behind him between three and four thousand folios of such copied music! Further, when he became a master in the Paris Conservatoire, he made all his pupils apply themselves to this music-copying. The labour, doubtless, is somewhat of a drudgery, but a more royal road, or any better method for acquiring strength and freedom in dealing with orchestral combination in composition, there is not. To copy a great score; to analyze it; to ask the why and wherefore of every bar before leaving it; to note the various accompaniments to the several voices and chorus; to examine the progressions and blending of the instruments—all constitute an application to study which well repays the labour bestowed. Text-books and works of method are good, but intelligent analysis of the original minds of music—as seen in the great scores—is better; and no doubt many students have, like Cherubini, realized this.

Happily neither the dimmed chamber nor the imperative score-copying tended to weaken the friendly relationship between Sarti and his gifted pupil. Cherubini went on—an obedient and painstaking pupil, full of intelligence and an anxiousness to excel speedily in his art. Sarti ordered him to abandon Leo and Durante for Palestrina, which he did; the master asked for an anthem, and the pupil supplied twenty. Little wonder that he afterwards became an exacting Conservatoire head!

It was through the good offices of Sarti that in 1780 Cherubini received a commission to write an opera for the Autumnal Fair at Alessandria della Paglia.

The work was entitled *Il Quinto Fabio*¹ (Opus 48), which proved to be neither a remarkable composition, nor one which was successful. Cherubini was not more fortunate with several other dramatic efforts which he made subsequently. In quick succession he produced Armida, in three acts, represented during the Carnival held at Florence in 1782; Adriano in Siria,² first performed at Leghorn; Il Messenzio, written for the Pergola Theatre at Florence; Lo Sposo di tre Femine, Marito di Nessuna, played at Venice in 1783; L'Idalide and L'Alessandro nell' Indie, composed in 1784. Not one of these operas brought Cherubini either money or reputation—in fact they successively convinced their hearers that Cherubini was not to their taste. He was too learned, too solid and emphatic for a populace in quest of exotic and luxuriant melody. The Florentines liked Cherubini in name and feature, but unfortunately they could not be prevailed upon to listen to his music. Thus Clément tells us that Cherubini's countrymen styled him Il Cherubino—not for the angelic beauty of his song, but for the charm of his person, his handsome face and beautiful curling hair.

Thus—as in the case of the prophet—in his own land, and among his own people, Cherubini stood in no great favour. It was for a foreign country to adopt and honour him, and for another people to accept him and his music. This nation was the French, who allowed themselves and their art to be influenced—and this for that considerable period until Boieldieu and Auber appeared—by the characteristics of this severe apostle of the Italian School: a composer who stands out a veritable giant among Italian masters of contrapuntal art, and one who ranks with the noblest followers of Bach and Handel in the great walk of polyphonic musical art.

¹ Cherubini says, "C'est mon premier opéra, j'avais alors dix-neuf ans accomplis."

² The famous male soprano Crescentini sang in this opera.

In the autumn of 1784, Cherubini received an invitation to visit London, en route to which he passed through Turin and Paris. This was in the good old days when it was the practice of Italian Opera managers not only to import renowned singers, but also to invite to this country distinguished composers, in order that works might be written expressly for the opera-house here. Tempora mutantur! Important events sprang from this journey. In Paris he met Viotti the violinist, and from this meeting Cherubini's long career among the French people really dates. It might have been otherwise had the people of Turin impressed him with their earnest regard, when he made, as it were, his final effort to please his own countrymen by bringing out there Ifigenia in Aulide, his eleventh opera.¹ Cherubini, however, placed his own value upon the smiles and applause with which the Turinese greeted this score—in which, by the way, is some of Cherubini's best music—for he returned and continued his stay in London, sensible beyond doubt of his failure in Italy; yet perchance not unmindful that a new era was dawning upon Italian musical art, when such sober and measured music had perforce to give way to a less learned one—distinguished for exuberance of melody and most lavish vocal fioriture—having its advent with Rossini.

¹ It is in this opera that Halévy discovered the first signs of Cherubini's budding genius.

In London Cherubini did not cause great stir, although George Prince of Wales noticed Cherubini, and an appointment was obtained for him as Composer to the King—which post Cherubini held for one year.¹

During his stay in London he produced in succession at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, La Finta Principessa (1785)—an opera buffa in two acts; and in 1786, Il Giulio Sabino, also in two acts, and having a libretto by Metastasio. Both these works were failures, for neither the débüt and singing of Marchesi, nor the goodwill of Cherubini's royal patrons were sufficient to float Giulio Sabino, which we are told "was murdered in its birth for want of the necessary support of the capital singers in the principal parts."

It was in 1788 that Cherubini arrived in Paris. Having become acquainted with Léonard, Marie Antoinette's coiffeur, who had obtained permission to found Italian opera, Cherubini was entrusted with the musical direction. He produced Démophon, the libretto of which was by Marmontel. This was on the 5th of December.

What had remained to its composer of the light character of the Neapolitan School, leavened even as this had been by his personal individuality, was deliberately placed aside in Démophon, wherein was clearly foreshadowed that grand style so soon to be found fully developed in Cherubini's next important opera. Démophon did not prove a success, but that it assured a brilliant future for its composer all the critics were agreed. The chief objections were that the music was cramped, dry, unequal in colour and dramatic interest. Here and there, be it recorded, a critic was found bold enough to throw a modicum of blame upon the librettist. Among such stood Fétis. "Marmontel's verses," wrote he, "were sham. It was a bad book"

¹ It was in this capacity, probably, that he assisted at the Handel Commemoration Festival in Westminster Abbey July, 1784.

Here what may be termed Cherubini's early and Italian period ends.

Now, undoubtedly, did Cherubini give signs of the great master which he was, ere long, to prove himself to be. Démophon failed to please, but it bore unmistakable evidence of a new vista in operatic method and style. Its thoroughly effective Overture was the first of a series, several of which, as is known, have proved ever welcome features in concert programmes. The opera itself exhibited plainly a state of artistic restlessness which could only be satisfied by uncontrolled expression. The finished detail, the majestic form, the brilliant instrumentation, the lofty style, the beautiful chorus music, all was of a new order, new from the composer, new to the public who listened to it. Failure that it was, contents and non-contents alike looked forward to a next opera with surprising anxiety.

The public had rather long to wait, for it was not until some three years afterwards that Cherubini's thirteenth opera saw the light. Possibly Fétis's assumption that the composition of Démophon was a "protracted torture" for Cherubini is the correct solution for the failure of the work. If so, the master may well be excused for his rest.

Lodoïska was produced on the 18th of July, 1791. In this work the higher flight was made. The forecasts in Démophon assumed actual form in Lodoïska. Cherubini here asserts himself in advanced harmonic combinations, brilliant, nay, even startling and realistic orchestral effects and tone colourings which mark a great artistic advance—a stride so vast that it is scarcely surprising that it caused alarm among the composers of the day.

Only these three years from the production of Démophon, and the habitués and others of the Salle Feydeau at Paris had the satisfaction of witnessing the performance of Lodoïska—the opera which made Cherubini's name famous throughout Europe, and which stamped its composer as a revolutionizer of Italian Opera, and the reformer, if not the founder of French Opera. Some folk went so far as to credit him with something worse than revolutionary propensities towards the lyric drama. The outburst of genius had at last come. If delayed, as was the case with Gluck and Rameau—the latter wrote his first opera when he was fifty—it was none the less determined. Nor was it an uncertain herald, for the new work breathed the spirit of stormy times, and evidenced clearly enough that a new era was dawning upon musical Europe, one to be not less marked in its phases of social life. Mozart, with his marvellous lyrical creations, had administered a severe blow to voluptuous dramatic music. Loved by the gods, the composer of Don Giovanni closed his eyes for ever in the same year that Lodoïska—the work of another purist—appeared to negative the approaching flood of melodic exuberance which was soon to distinguish the Rossinian period in Italian Opera.

More than this, Cherubini, like Mozart, gave fresh life to dramatic music. Music, as did other matters, languished in the Eighteenth century, and the fulness and depth which Cherubini incorporated, notably in Lodoïska, bore striking contrast to the flimsy and soulless compositions of the departing age. Reviewing the growth and development of lyrical art since its day, the artistic import of works, such as Lodoïska, Mozart's Don Giovanni, and operas by other giant purists, becomes more and more apparent. Without those great life-giving properties—the deep grounded musical purpose and intent, the profound learning, combined with harmonic and melodic resource, the richness of fancy and idea, the command of vocal and instrumental forms, the grasp of happy periods and great dramatic situations—all this, and more, which make up a great musical structure, had a distinct advent in the dramatic compositions of Mozart, Gluck, and Cherubini; and without such properties stage music would have reached us in pitiable garb. It is the great lyrical compositions of these masters which have made dramatic music, and which have long served to check and steady the impetus of a Lodoïska fell like a thunderbolt amid the music of the day in France. It was a well-directed effort; a species of musical purgative; and withal an original and masterly composition. Many of the Parisians liked it—many did not. That it was produced nearly two hundred times in one year was sufficient testimony of its merits for the former; while the dissentients were comforted with not a little adverse criticism which the opera received. One of these critical finger-posts was of opinion that “Cherubini had not become worthy of being placed beside the Paisiellos, the Guglielmis, and the Cimarosas, his contemporaries,” going on to say that “since it is easier to produce harmonies and noise, effects of purely theoretical calculation, than to create song, M. Cherubini, renouncing the Italian method, which requires imagination and fecundity, allies himself to the German manner in substituting for an expressive melody the noisy and often unnatural effects of instrumental profusion.”

Possibly this intelligent guide was impregnated with the creed that music to be music should consist of all tunes, in which case the new style of music by Cherubini, characterized as it was with a great command of theoretical device and orchestral resource, must have proved both novel, perplexing, and disappointing!

Lodoïska supplied a further instance of the indifferent libretti which seemed to be the lot of this master-mind. The story was a mixture of the Richard Cœur de Lion and Fidelio elements, and though it possessed points of interest, it was ad-

The plot is the usual story: Lodoïska, in love with one Floreski, is a prisoner in the castle of a more powerful suitor, Dourlinski. Floreski presents himself at the castle as brother to Lodoïska, and anxious, for the mother's sake, for the girl's return. Tyrannous Dourlinski receives him cordially, but keeps his eye upon him, with the result that Floreski is discovered drugging the soldiers who guard the precious Lodoïska. The concoction employed could have been no mean mixture, since the guards declare of it "Bon-bon," though it has brought them down with giddy heads on to the flag-stones. At this juncture occurs a catastrophe which quickly disposes of the intrigue element. The castle is stormed by the Tartars, and Dourlinski, with his mind intent probably upon more mundane things, forgets Lodoïska, with the result that the rescue of the heroine is easily established.

Between the production of Lodoïska and Medée, in which latter work Cherubini soars to the height of his operatic greatness, little of importance occurred—save, perhaps, firstly the production in December, 1794, of Eliza,¹ an opera with music of extreme beauty and tenderness, but having a wretched libretto; second, the Foundation in 1795 of the Paris Conservatoire of Music, whereof Cherubini was appointed Inspector and Master in Counterpoint; and lastly, Cherubini's marriage—this in 1795—to Cécile Tourette.

Of this marriage were born one son and two daughters.

Eliza, the above-mentioned opera, is in two acts.

¹ Madame Scio was the first Eliza.

The words by St. Cyr proved quite unworthy of the exceptionally beautiful music to which Cherubini wedded them. Hence has become lost to the world some of the most tender and highly dramatic music that emanated from this rich fount. The scene is laid on Mont St. Bernard. It is early morn, Prior and monks, lantern in hand, and with picks and faithful hounds, are out on the mount in quest for any lost or snow-bound travellers. A still more compassionate task, however, awaits the Prior. He learns of the disconsolate grief of one Florindo, who has been informed by letter of the inconstancy of his lover, Eliza. Consolation is unavailing. The Prior comforts, but Florindo will not be comforted, and, as night is approaching Florindo is urged to a shelter in the hospice. The evening bell tolls, and among those whom it calls to the hospice are the voyagers Eliza and her servant Laura, accompanied by a guide. Ere she enters, Eliza faints from exhaustion. The next day the Prior engages in conversation with Eliza. Florindo's name is soon introduced, but alas, the outcome is that nothing but death can assuage his wounds. An approaching storm seems to favour this. Soon the mountain is the scene of a terrible frenzy—storm, lightning and an avalanche. Amid all Florindo is espied on the edge of a precipice; a mass of falling snow sweeps Florindo and all about it. Then comes the rescue, and all ends joyously. Such briefly are the main points of the story of one of the gems of operatic construction from Cherubini's fertile pen, a work which an enterprising impresario might do worse than unearth for present day theatre-goers, who would, doubtless, welcome something of an operatic novelty in lieu of the worn-out Italian operas which every season again brings round.

Medée, or Medea, the sixteenth opera, was produced at the Feydeau Théâtre on the 13th of March, 1797. It was not a success—a result that was attributed to a variety of reasons, the chief of these being that Hoffmann, the librettist, had written a weak book—a dull and heavy one it assuredly was—and that the Feydeau establishment had not the means and the staff for doing the opera and the music even moderate justice. Respecting the music the critics of the time discovered in it reminiscences of Méhul and Gluck: others expressed quite opposite views, admiring its melodies, its instrumentation, and, above all, its striking originality! None of them, however, appear to have discovered the chief objection to the opera, which is a decided monotony in its general sentiment, and a too complete centreing of the interest in the title rôle. And bearing in mind that in this opera, and also in Les Deux Journées, Cherubini forsakes more and more the melodic profuseness and rapture of Italian art, and substitutes consummate theoretical learning, combined with a nobility of strength and richness of orchestration hitherto unknown in opera, it is not surprising that the reception of Medée was unfavourable to Cherubini. The result, too, of an inefficient caste may well be imagined. The physical power necessary to sustain the part of Medea is terrific, while the whole opera is on so large a scale, and is so full of tremendous scenes that it has come to be re-hardly possible." The grandest and most imposing dramatic music Cherubini ever wrote is to be found in Medée, but it makes trying demands upon soloist and chorus alike.

The Overture in the first place is a consummate work of classical art. Sir George Grove has said of it:—"The intention of the overture (to Medée)—doubtless designed to reflect the story, though quite independent of the opera itself—every hearer may best interpret for himself. Though a most effective composition, and as an orchestral piece of music full of beauties, it appears to the writer to belong more to the region of pure music—the overtures to the Zauberflöte and Così Fan Tutti—than to those more romantic and picturesque compositions of which Beethoven gave the world the earliest examples in his Coriolan and Leonora, and which Mendelssohn continued in his Hebrides and Melusina, and other grand and delightful compositions of this class. With all its power and skill, Cherubini's mind was too conservative and classical to permit of his entering on this path in the orchestra. But his overtures are so pure, so free from everything petty or commonplace, and so abounding in beauty, that while listening to them one may well be pardoned for forgetting that any school of music ever existed but that of which they form so bright and enduring an ornament."

Medée is Cherubini's greatest achievement in dramatic music. No other of the twenty-and-five operas which he composed displays the composer in so great and sublime a mood. Its grandeur and masterpieces of the regenerator of opera, Gluck. It is a chef-d'œuvre which, it may be truly said, remains unsurpassed in the domain of dramatic art. Many better known operas exist, many a lyrical production has kept the stage longer, many a more grateful vocal score is known to the singer and auditor, but as a stupendous work, both in conception and treatment, it is transcendently great, and in every respect a notable example of tragical musical drama.

The story of Medée is familiar to all readers of Greek tales and translations of classic legends. In the version of it as set by Cherubini, the old Greek story is sensibly weakened by undue prominence to the debased element in the story.

Medée holds the German public more than either French or English audiences. It was at the Frankfort Theatre that the late Mr. Chorley first saw it represented, and then wrote, "The opera might be objected to as one too largely made up of solos and duets, were it not for the ingenuity with which the chorus is employed to heighten and work up several of the movements, so as to conceal the monotony which else must have resulted from such a general want of complication. . . . It must be further owned that the entire part (of Medea) is written most ungraciously for the voice—that besides its merciless length and demand upon the energies, it perpetually claims qualities which are not vocal." To confirm this latter statement, the author of "Modern German Music" cites the case of Madame Scio, whose deadly complaint arose from Nevertheless, there are many indescribably beautiful numbers in Medée. The number for bass solo and chorus in which Creon invokes a blessing on the bride and Jason, is superb in its vocal and instrumental advantages. Not less perfect is Cherubini's idea and utterance in the duet, in this same first act, for Medea and Jason. The worked-up passion is tremendous, and probably the whole annals of dramatic music do not afford a more striking instance of sustained and passionate expression than the close to this initial act in Medée. A similar outburst of impetuous capacity occurs in another duet for the same two personages in the second act. The most beautiful music, however, appears in the closing bridal scene of act two. Here all the stately severity of Cherubini's style serves the master. Especially is this noticeable in the fine march introduced here, which must ever rank with the best examples of such movements. The third act is the marvel of the work. It contains one of the grandest storm scenes in music's répertoire. As Mr. Chorley wrote:—"From the time when Medea appears on the scene, in the midst of this tumult of the elements, she is never again allowed to leave the stage, the remainder of the opera consisting of two scenas for her, both on the grandest scale; the first with her children, the second as the triumphant Nemesis dealing destruction round her."

It was on June 6th, 1865, that Medée was revived at Her Majesty's Theatre under the direction of Signor Arditi, and during Mr. Mapleson's management. On this occasion the trying title rôle was accepted by the —alas! now departed—famed Mdle. Tietjens. Of the performance the truly great critic of the Athenæum wrote:—"We have never accepted Mdle. Tietjens as the new Tragic Muse, on whom the mantle of Pasta and Malibran is reputed to have fallen; but this, by much the most difficult part she has attempted, is the one in which she seems, as an actress, to approach nearer high drama than on any other occasion. She misses, however, an opportunity in the bridal scene, the one where Pasta's attitude of silent vengeance maturing its full purpose was so appalling, without the slightest disturbance of stage effect. Her voice proves equal to the strain with which it is loaded by Cherubini. We shall be disappointed if this does not ripen into one of her best personations. The Jason, Dr. Günz, is perhaps no more insipid than a Jason is permitted to be. Mr. Sautley's Creon (though the part is not among those which suit his voice best) is excellent, and so is the orchestra, and so is the chorus. The audience was thoroughly aroused and interested. On ourselves this superb ideal work, as coming after the effect of the washy, flashy, trashy musical dramas which we are invited to accept as new, is not to be overstated. The sensation of satisfaction and excitement, not without surprise, is as strong as that which any true lover of sculpture must feel, who, after 'running the gauntlet' through a crowd of fauns, dancing-girls, and other such modern furniture marble-folk, finds himself looking up to Michael Angelo's 'Pensiero' in the Medici chapel."

Passing over L'Hôtellerie Portugaise, a one-act opera, produced on July 25th, 1798, and La Punition (1799), we come to Les Deux Journées, in which work its fertile composer is seen in his happiest mood as an opera composer.

Les Deux Journées was first represented at the Feydeau Théâtre on January 16th, 1800. It was unanimously declared to be a masterpiece of lyric drama, and the Parisian connoisseurs raved over its incomparable music. It saw some two hundred representations ere the public admiration even cooled, and then the opera went the round of all the European capitals, while in Germany, where it became known as Der Wasserträger, it took a firm hold. The libretto has always been the admiration of musicians—even of Mendelssohn, who was most fastidious in the matter of libretti.

The story of the libretto is a very interesting one, and relates the expedients of a persecuted President of the French Parliament, who is befriended in his escapes by a kindly water-carrier. The scene is laid in Paris, and in the village of Gonesse, and the time is 1647.

From a musical and literary point of view, success was deserved. The libretto by Bouilly was at once well chosen, carefully treated, and distinctly interesting; indeed, Goethe looked upon it as a model comic opera book. Musically it was a stroke of real genius. As has been well said, the composition presented so many particular beauties, such great perfection, that it at once took its rank as a classical work. . . . The most famous composers studied it and Beethoven used always to keep the score by him on his table.

Doubtless Les Deux Journées is a more agreeable opera than Medée, to which it stands in bold contrast. Here Cherubini subjugates his severe style with its decorous moderation in melody and feeling, for a sphere of art so natural, so suave that even the untutored ear is tempted to linger long over the arias and couplets in this idyllic drama. So genial is Cherubini, as we here find him, making concessions to beauty of sound and allowing his severer muse to give way to a less formal one with more warmth of feeling and passionate expression, that it might be regretted that the classic composer did not labour more in the realm of melodic fancy and artistic abandon. Nothing could exceed the ease and grace of the melodies in this opera, while their charm and vocal aptness are a sufficient argument against the assertions of those who are in the habit of contending that Cherubini could not write for the voice. Of the general musical perfection of Il Portatore d'Acqua (by which title the same opera is known in Italy), of all the richness of its magnificent instrumentation, its brilliant orchestration, of its wealth of scientific form and detail, it would be impossible to speak too highly. Such a diorama of tone may well be likened to the unveiling of a glorious Paul Veronese.

The best of criticism has always been in favour of Les Deux Journées. Schlüter says, "The music itself is perfect, being equally distinguished for tenderness and expressiveness as for noble simplicity and purity of form." Fétis writes, "There is a copiousness of melody in Cherubini, especially in the Deux Journées ; but such is the richness of the accompanying harmony, and the brilliant colouring of the instrumentation considering the period when the work appeared ; such, above all, was the inability of the leaders of the public taste to appreciate at that time the combination of all these beauties, that the merit of the melody was not appreciated at its just value." Weber has said, "The opera displays a pleasing richness of melody, vigorous declamation, and all-striking truth in the treatment of the situations, ever new, ever heard and retained with pleasure." A more modern writer (Ritter), speaking of Les Deux Journées and Cherubini's other operas, declares "they will remain for the earnest student a classic source of exquisite artistic enjoyment, and serve as models of a perfect mastery over the deepest resources and means that the rich field of musical art presents."

One great advance Cherubini effected in Les Deux Journées. He hit hard at the accepted operatic system—musical dramas composed of airs from beginning to end. The whole of this fascinating score was composed (with the exception of a duet and canzonet) of concerted pieces and choruses, all strong and vigorous in character, and strikingly beautiful in harmonial mould and orchestral colouring.

Spohr's testimony to the beauties of this work runs thus :—"I recollect when the Deux Journées was performed for the first time, how, intoxicated with delight and the powerful impression that the work had made on me, I asked on that very evening to have the score given to me, and sat over it the whole night, and that it was that opera chiefly that gave me the first impulse to composition."

The introduction in E major to the Overture of Les Deux Journées is a piece of music which has always commanded the admiration of good critics. That excellent judge, the late Professor John Ella, says of it,—

"To my mind there is no more striking effect of powerful imagination suggestive of the darkest imagery of tragic incidents than the whole of the introduction to Les Deux Journées. After the two lovely cadences of serene placid harmony, come the basses with powerful unisons in a grand figure of a vague character reposing on a deep pedal note. How touching are the bewailing short melodic phrases so tenderly expressed, with the penetrating chord of the augmented fifth in its simple structure! The mysterious tremolo of the violins, the wailing effect of the flutes, the tragic responses of the basses, and the terrific utterance of the corni ff in the fifth of the dominant, until the grand climax of the allegro, are in the highest degree suggestive, and have served Weber and Mendelssohn to good purpose. This introduction I have always considered one of the most poetical creations of Cherubini." Subjoined are a few bars which will help the mind towards an appreciation of the enthusiastic vein of the author of "Musical Sketches: Abroad and at Home," in his admiration of this masterly Introductory movement:—

Andante, molto sostenuto.

CHERUBINI.

Viol. 1.

ff pp Viol. 2.

Cello, Viola.

ff pp

Basso.

Cello.

BASSI TUTTI.

a.....

ff > p

Wind.

b.....

Violins.

p p p

fr p

BASSI TUTTI.

fr ff > p

Flute Solo.

b.....

Oboe.

Flutes.

fz

p p fr

'Cello.

Bassoon Solo lower.

f

p

p

p

'Cello.

Wind Instruments.

p

fz

p c.....

Strings. pp

d.....

'Cello.

Tutti. f

The musical score consists of three systems of three staves each. The first system features dynamics f, p, and fz, along with crescendo markings. The second system is marked Corni. and Tutti. with dynamics ff and vocalizations cen. and do.. The third system is marked Allegro. with dynamics f and cres..

- a. Figure for basses in unison.
- b. Melodic phrases.
- c. Tremolo of the violins.
- d. Responses of the basses.

It was on Thursday, the 20th of June, 1872, that an Italian version of this masterpiece by Cherubini (under the title I Due Giornate) was produced in London at Drury Lane Theatre under the direction of that unrivalled chef d'orchestra, the late Sir Michael Costa. The caste included Mdle. Tietjens as Constance, Mdle. Roze as Marcellina, Mdle. Bauermeister filled the part of Angelina, Signor Agnesi was the "Water-carrier," Signor Rinaldini Antonio, while Signor Foli played the rôle of the Commander.

With such a company—alas! how few remain—a magnificent rendering was inevitable—and this proved to be the issue. The singing and acting of Mdle. Tietjens was never surpassed by any previous representations, and her efforts alone seemed to ensure a wide popularity for the work in this country. Every one was enthusiastic. "The expressions of admiration on the part of the public," wrote the talented critic of the Athenæum, "were palpable and audible enough; and in the corridors, and in the foyer, ordinarily cold and self-possessed musicians declared their enthusiastic appreciation of the work, of the masterly accompaniments of Sir Michael Costa for the dialogue and action, and of its extraordinarily fine execution."

Yet a scare was got up! A few daily-paper critics told the public that the story was too simple, and the music too learned; it was suggested that the opera would not 'draw.' The alarm was taken up, and finally Mr. Mapleson, as impresario, had no other course open to him other than that of withdrawing a work which did not commend itself to the leaders of popular musical opinion!

An important opera that followed Les Deux Journées was Anacréon,¹ the libretto of which was furnished by one Mendouze, who, judging from the book in question, had not acquired the art of writing successful librettos.

¹ The full title to this work is Anacréon, ou l'Amour fugitif.

Anacréon was first represented at the Grand Opéra on the 4th of October, 1803, and, surviving for a while, died an early death. Mr. Bellasis, in his "Memorials of Cherubini," states that "Cherubini, in a private letter, attributed the failure of the work à la clique infernale acharnée contre tous ceux qui font partie du Conservatoire." It is not less probable, however, that the popular opinion as to the heavy character of the Anacréon music was the real cause of the failure. In fact, the generous music—the happy style and colouring, so profuse in Les Deux Journées—had not been maintained in Anacréon. The music of the latter reflected, perhaps, too faithfully the mind and disposition of its maker. Cherubini was unhappy at this time. He had had two or three collisions with Napoleon, and was gloomy and disappointed. So, too, was his music moody and unsatisfactory.

Yet the work possessed some beauties. There is the magnificent Overture—a model of what overtures should be—full of rich melody, supported by striking and original combinations of the tone art.¹ All the choruses of the opera are concise and replete with effect; while it would be difficult to find music to surpass the beauty, the elegance, and originality of such numbers as the trio "Dans ma verte et belle jeunesse," and the quartet "Des nos cœurs purs."

¹ Cherubini impressed the Overture form. It is in the Anacréon Overture that he secures a grand effect by originating the long and gradual crescendo, thus anticipating a similar expedient by Rossini.

Nevertheless, Cherubini's fame continued to spread. His music had carried his name far and wide, and in Germany especially had it met with every appreciation. It is scarcely surprising, therefore, to find him the recipient of an invitation to compose an opera for Vienna—the then great seat of the musical world—an invitation coupled with the request that he would conduct it personally.

Faniska, an opera in three acts, was the result of this commission, and the work was represented for the first time at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre on the 25th of February, 1806, not alone before the Emperor Francis Joseph II and his splendid Court, but before Beethoven and Haydn, whom historians tell us pushed in among the crowd that they too might hear the music and strains of him whom they regarded so highly, and to whose unrivalled power and learning they were not ashamed to bear witness. "I am very old," exclaimed the aged Father of Symphony as he embraced Cherubini, "but I am your son."

Nothing could have been more spontaneous than the success which Faniska achieved. Every one liked it—the critics, the Viennese musicians, French composers, the Italian melodists, the occupants of the stalls and boxes, and even the gallery censors were unanimous in their praise. "The magnificent music," wrote one reviewer, "excited the admiration of all competent critics."

The story of Faniska runs thus:—In one of the convulsions which have desolated Poland, Faniska and her infant daughter are seized and imprisoned in the castle of Count Zamoski. The fortunate jailor is, of course, selon les règles, deeply enamoured of his captive, and also, of course, finds her deaf to his most earnest entreaties. As a last resource, he determines to impress her with the belief that her husband is dead. Rasinski, who, in disguise, is hovering round his rival's castle, offers to become himself the messenger of his own decease, and is introduced for that purpose to the lady. He meets his wife with firmness, and delivers to her his own portrait as the proof of his veracity, when the infantine caresses of his daughter cause him to betray himself, and he is forthwith consigned to a dungeon, with the not comfortable assurance of meeting, on the morrow, the fate of a traitor. This ends the first act. The second and third are occupied by the usual intrigues and expedients to work his liberation, which is at length effected; his party storm the castle, Zamoski falls, and the husband and wife are again united.

Faniska is a triumph of musical art. Its magnificent Overture, so well known, is frequently allotted a place in concert programmes, and any comment upon it would be superfluous. Nor is the rest of the music less masterly or less deserving of popularity, for there is much in Faniska equal to anything Cherubini has written. Of the most varied and beautiful character, abounding with charming points of imitation and graceful contrapuntal learning, rich with choice harmonies and ever-varying tints of tone and orchestral colour, the music may be said to show Cherubini in his happiest mood. If it is not an error of judgment to quote individual examples where all the numbers are almost past description, special stress might be placed upon the exquisite and thoroughly characteristic aria, an early number in the opera, for Zamoski, the bass—a song in E flat which should be in the répertoire of every bass singer with a good compass, and a desire to possess a thoroughly characteristic excerpt by this classic composer. In the next number occurs the expressive Pregliera ‘Eterno Iddio,’ “of which,” says a writer in the Harmonicon, “it is hardly too much to say, that, for variety of modulation and just expression, it yields only to the great scene in Don Giovanni, where Donna Anna mourns over the dead body of her murdered parent, and incites her lover to revenge his death.” The accompaniment for the three violoncelli to this prayer, and the interspersed passages for the oboe and flute are wedded to the song in the happiest manner. Other equally interesting numbers are a duet for Faniska and Rasinski; a beautiful Romance in G minor—both in the second act.

All the choruses are spirited and harmonious, and the military music in the third act is exceedingly clever. As a whole the work is in every sense worthy a place on modern opera boards, and it must always rank as one of the finest contributions to the lyric drama.

Cherubini still clung to dramatic art. As a matter of fact it was not profitable to him in a pecuniary sense, but he was at least making himself heard and felt through its channel.

Hence, following Faniska came Pimmalion,¹ in one act, represented, as the work of an anonymous composer, before the Emperor Napoleon I. at the Château des Tuileries Théâtre (1809); Le Crescendo,² an opera of little interest (1810); when we come to *Les Abencérages*³—the libretto of which was written by Jouy. On the 6th of April, 1813, the work was given at the Grand Opéra, but without success, although the Parisians admired the music and the treatment of the poor libretto.

As to the beauty of the music, Mendelssohn bore testimony many years afterwards. "I've got his (Cherubini's) Abencérages," wrote the last of the Titans of music, "and cannot sufficiently admire the sparkling fire, the clever original phrasing, the extraordinary delicacy and refinement with which the whole is written, or feel grateful enough to the grand old man for it. Besides, it is all so free."

The Overture to Les Abencérages, so obscure in several parts, has been well likened to the sun disengaging itself with difficulty from the clouds enveloping it. Reference is made to this Overture in a number of the "Quarterly Musical Magazine," a publication which it is to be regretted came to a ¹ Napoleon was moved to tears by the music of this opera. His bearing towards its composer remained, however, unaltered.

² In this opera is a remarkable song rendered by a being who dislikes any sort of noise. Consequently the air, which is descriptive of a combat, is sung sotto voce to a very soft accompaniment.

³ The attention of the Parisian public was diverted from this opera by the disastrous news of the French retreat from Moscow.

discontinuance. There F. W. H. says, "The least attractive of any Cherubini has written, this overture still contains many indubitable proofs of the ability which may be found more fully displayed in the others."

Ali Baba,¹ the last and twenty-fifth of Cherubini's operas, and which has the merit of being the longest he wrote, contained no less than a thousand pages of manuscript—so long, in fact, that the Paris publishers declined to print the whole of the MS. It appeared in 1833, or twenty years after Les Abencérages, being first represented at the Académie de Musique on the 22nd July. It is probably the tamest of Cherubini's mature period compositions for the lyric stage, possessing little or no individuality, replete with sheer learning and antiquated scholarship, but quite devoid of inspired or beautiful music. The history of the score as given by Cherubini is this:—"An opera which I began long ago (this was in 1783, when it bore the title Kourkourgi) in three acts, and which I finished in four acts, with a prologue."

This work proved yet another failure. More anxious for his reputation in his old than he had ever been in his young days, Cherubini did not forget to paper the pit of the theatre, whither he sent many of his Conservatoire scholars. They found an enemy there in the person of Berlioz. "Ere the first act was over," Berlioz says, "I was so disappointed at not having heard something new, that I could not restrain myself from muttering loud enough to be heard by those around me, 'Twenty francs for an idea!' In the second act I increased my bid—'Forty francs for an idea!' The finale began, and the same tame music continued. 'There!' I exclaimed, 'eighty francs for an idea!' The finale over, I rose up, exclaiming, 'Ah, my faith! I am not rich enough—I give it up!'"

¹ Also named Hali Baba; ou les Quarante Voleurs.

As for Cherubini, "He," writes one of his biographers, "after the last general rehearsal left for Versailles, having carefully calculated beforehand the duration of the acts and entr'actes. When the clock at the palace of Versailles struck eight o'clock in the evening of the day of Ali Baba's first representation, Cherubini pulled out his watch and said, 'Maintenant ou commence l'ouverture.' At every hour, or rather at every act, he looked at his watch. At half-past eleven Ali Baba was over according to his watch, 'Which,' said he, 'allait tres bien, et marquait l'heure de l'opéra.'"

The old man then went to bed and slept peacefully, but did not return to Paris until he had received a re-assuring dispatch, and never once went to see Ali Baba performed.

The public all but snored over Ali Baba, and the strong-minded openly vowed it to be the last effort of a grand old man. One account says, "In Ali Baba everything was wearisome and superfluous—poem, music, and ballet. Those fastidious forty thieves had better rested eternally buried in their jars and in the works of Galland. . . Ali Baba is one of those fossilized operas which a director only accepts when they are thrust down his throat by illustrious old age. . . . The public yawned so much and so widely under Ali Baba's very nose, that real hissing would have spoken less eloquently."

A more favourable criticism was to the effect that, "All competent judges were lost in astonishment at the fact of a composer, whose first works bore the date of 1771, being able sixty years later to produce another of such extraordinary freshness and such glowing fancy. . . . His latest dramatic production displayed, in conjunction with the maturest knowledge and the most beautiful form, the loveliest blossoms of profound feeling and youthful passion."

* * * *

Here, then, we leave Cherubini as a composer for the lyric stage. His most fervent admirers could hardly style him a successful opera composer, or one who, despite all that he did, had permanently influenced the style of any school of operatic music, not even the French school, to which he allied himself more than any other. He certainly gave an appreciable impetus to French opera, but those very qualities most characteristic of Cherubini's music were least calculated to make it popular with the French people.

The Parisians were by no means insensible to his magnificent musical ensembles, or to the means employed in securing these, but his pure classicism never went down deep into their hearts, and the first tolerable music-maker that came by—Auber, to wit—supplanted him in their affections. This was poor gratitude to the man who, if he did not permanently influence the style of, yet raised the lyric drama in France to an importance as a social necessity far beyond that at which he found it; who, we might say, created Méhul, Lesueur, Spontini, and Halévy; and who gave a spurt to musical art generally, at a critical moment such as has fallen to the lot of few other musicians to give.

It is scarcely a pleasant task to reflect upon the dramatic music side of Cherubini's career. It was marked by many vicissitudes—personal, political, and professional. For over thirty years—for such is the space between Il Quinto Fabio of 1780 and Les Abencérages of 1813—the champion of purity and dignity in art had laboured in the cause of stage music. A reasonable expectation—and one which every lover of truth in conception and expression would expect to have seen realized—would have been a steady and ever-increasing success, work by work. But such a progressive experience was not the portion of this son of art. A missionary of classic doctrine, his ideal standard was not understood of the people; the soil of France was no congenial one for such a teaching, whether by precept or example. The temper of the public was towards a lively strain. Ear-tickling music was the order preferred, and the aural senses were so pledged that the persistent teachings of Cherubini were not of efficacy enough to wean ear and mind to a sound lyrical perception.

It is easy to see the lyrical purpose of Cherubini. He had in mind the development of the highest form of grand opera for France. Gluck's reforms and aims needed to be carried on, and Cherubini determined to do this. Despite obstacle, he accomplished his task, although it proved an unprofitable labour for himself, and has been apparently of little lasting art advantage to subsequent dramatic music in France. As a German musical writer¹ says, "While Cherubini carried out, in the melody, the fundamental law of dramatic truth, the agreement of the music with the situations in the drama, and their poetic expression, as laid down by Gluck, he exhibited greater depth of intention, fuller and bolder harmony, and a style of instrumentation which, by its richness, and the characteristic employment of the wind instruments especially, in conformity with the peculiar quality of their sound, introduced the orchestra in a brilliant manner, not only as the foundation for the vocal portion, but also as its necessary adjunct, and its equal in bringing about the theatrical effect as a whole."

The first notable indication of the new and grand style was seen in Démophon, wherein, as Picchianti says, "Cherubini exhibited a more elaborate workmanship, more grandeur of form, and so suddenly perfected his style, that he rose above the ordinary and popular intelligence of the time. . . . Only to those who thoroughly understood him was it given to foresee what a brilliant future for the French lyric stage the new composer was preparing." A beautiful number of this comparatively unknown score is the chorus, 'Ah! vous rendez la vie,' the pure character of which, its vocal aptness, its bright and skilful orchestration, render it one of the gems of truly original musical conception, an excerpt thoroughly characteristic of the new-style music which Cherubini desired for France.

With this first step, however, came an unfortunate coincidence. The public was interested in another Démophon by another composer—Vogel, a Bohemian spirit who expired on the eve of the production of his finished work. Thus attention was withdrawn or refused to Cherubini's original score.

Undaunted, Cherubini made a still further effort. In Lodoïska he boldly assailed French music, and originated that music of effect (musique d'effet) which has marked subsequent opera.

This inspiration, this higher flight, was entirely his own, and the army of adherents which the style has had—Méhul, Berton, Steibelt, Lesueur, Grétry, Auber, Boieldieu, and later on, Meyerbeer and Rossini—is ample proof of the importance of the path opened out in France by this pioneer composer. Mozart (1756-1791) had accomplished much by way of grand vocal and orchestral effect in his glorious creations—the Figaro and Don Giovanni operas, but the Salzburg master's scores could scarcely have been at the service of Cherubini. Lodoïska appeared in the same year that Mozart died, and music of to-day probably owes more than is generally supposed to the bearing it exercised upon subsequent French musical activity.

The great and original art standard reached by Cherubini in Lodoïska was maintained in subsequent scores, notably in Medée and Les Deux Journées, but withal Cherubini remained to the end of his operatic career without the attainment of popular success.

To what may this be ascribed?

For his day Cherubini was too learned. Musicians understood him, but the people at large did not. As for the musical critics, they, as usual, were for and against. His second opera startled the people, and even friends staggered over his measured melody and studied harmonies. "Too learned!" was the judgment pronounced as far back as the production of Adriano. Démophon was received as dry and constrained, and though Halévy could admire its instrumentation, and Picchianti was enabled to trace its "masculine beauties," the public remained unappreciative. Much the same charges attended his other operas.

Another element against the success of Cherubini in the walk of dramatic art was the political disruptions which engaged France. A decade such as that between the years 1790 and 1800 was no favourable one for a musician to plant a standard. Political feeling over-rode everything, all was pervaded with it. Bloodshed and terror united in 1793, and when Louis the Sixteenth mounted the scaffold in the Place de Louis Quinze, Cherubini lay hid in a Carthusian monastery near Rouen. Ill luck surrounded him, too, soon after the production of Faniska.

With wife and family he had repaired to the Austrian capital in 1805, but scarcely had the praises of Haydn and Beethoven concerning Faniska been uttered, than France and Austria were at war. With the French troops in the palace gardens of Francis II., all hopes and any fruits of success were deferred. Thus for a long time in his career France was no home for the successful exercise of Cherubini's artist mind. It was no advantage to him to be forced into the National Guard; to have his friends and few patrons scattered and expatriated; at times forced to be present at scaffold scenes and executions; at one time obliged to compose Republican songs, at others compelled to administer to the musical cravings of King or Consul.

If we seek for further explanations for his comparative failure as an opera composer, it will not be denied that he was singularly unfortunate in the selection of his libretti. Again, he was not a born Frenchman, and to fail at times in marrying beautiful music to an unmusical language is a fault which may be easily condoned.

Cherubini's muse is neither French, nor German, nor Italian, and it is not surprising that, so far as the French lyric stage is concerned, it had to make way for the more dainty and piquant melody and harmony that came in with Boieldieu, Auber, and others. Nevertheless, Cherubini will always command a place in opera history.

Unhappily for Cherubini he does not meet the unanimous approval of vocalists. Singers urge that he has not written vocal, much less grateful music for the voice, but it would be probably less libellous to say that he declines to orchestrate favourably for the singer; for Cherubini has a manner of finding a melody, and of wedding it to more than enough of the mathematical of contrapuntal art, and to singers accustomed to the suave tunes of Mozart, and to the instrumentally supported melodies of Rossini and Verdi, a liberal dose of contrapuntal finish and detail would be calculated to prove distasteful. Yet this must be the full measure of the charge. Cherubini is invariably happy in his instrumental combinations and selections, though at times he may overclothe his melodies.

Here, however, the man's mission asserts itself. He was born to be a composer of symphonies rather than of operas, to make instruments speak, not men, and it is to be regretted that he missed his way as a symphonist. Cherubini's name can, however, never be dissociated from any history of the orchestra. He could wield with a strong hand, and in all his musical effects, whether in the delicate combination of a string quartet, or amid the majesty of a full orchestral movement, Cherubini's vigour never flags, his originality constantly establishes itself, and the harmonic and melodic element leave nothing to be desired. He strikes decisively. There are no uncertain effects. All is sharp and firmly cut as the outline of a Grecian marble. And, if we pause for a while to dwell upon the exquisite finish which the master gives to his work, every line, whether in a simple phrase or vast movement, is distinguished by a fine and skilful perception, which could only be possible in the work of one gifted with a rare and keen sense of what is poetic and beautiful.

Especially in Cherubini's Overtures are the characteristics of his classic style fully incorporated and evident; and of such overtures those to Medée, Anacréon, and Les Deux Journées will live as long as music lasts. "They," says Schlüter, "are replete with vigour and character, their admirably drawn outline, exquisite finish, and instrumentation cause them to be reckoned as models of their kind."

A SACRED MUSIC COMPOSER.

IF Cherubini has not covered himself with glory in his Operatic works he has won an immortal fame through his Sacred music—his Masses, Requiems, Litanies, and numerous minor compositions for the service of the Roman Church. This latter art work is marked with a strong individuality, and is of an artistic merit that will secure for it an enduring appreciation from all lovers of Church music.

Just as Handel, worn out with failure and disappointment as a composer of opera, turned, when well into life to sacred art, by which act the world was enriched by such immortal oratorios as the "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," "Judas Maccabæus," and others, so Cherubini's career furnishes us with something of a parallel experience. His operatic career had, too, ended in failure. His emoluments had not increased; Napoleon steadily refused him recognition or profitable post; little else seemed to await the master but a continuance of the injustice and tardy encouragement which had already led to so slow an advancement. Disgusted and disappointed, he sought relief in the quiet country home of a friend. This slight episode in his career led to a complete change in his artistic aims, and attracted him at the age of nearly fifty to the grand realm of sacred musical art.

Here we meet Cherubini at his best. His great gifts were a power of exciting and of stimulating emotion, together with an unusual capacity for the theoretical side of his art. For the exercise of the latter of these qualities the field of Church music proved an eminently favourable domain. Here he was free to develop his masterly contrapuntal skill, far more suited to Church than to Opera music, while the lack of sustained and romantic melody would be less apparent in the grandest credo or gloria than in the meanest of operas.

Thus it cannot be doubted that Cherubini is seen at most advantage in his sacred music, which will live long after his works for the lyric stage. It marks a new epoch in Roman Church music, and goes far to prove that it is possible for sacred music to be something other than stagey and theatrical, however dramatic it may be, and that the highest resources of art can be so employed as to conduce to a right spirit of devotion, arousing and elevating the prayerful soul rather than hindering or distracting it in the contemplation of things holy.

"Cherubini," writes a Father of the Roman Church, "possessed a remarkable aptitude for rendering sensible, for interpreting religious truths, and when we hear his music we understand that this harmonious language, so sublime, so persuasive, is not made for the holy temples, but for our intercourse with heaven."

Picchianti says: "Cherubini created a new kind of religious music which had nothing in common with anything that had been produced before."

This is agreed. The Church of his creed is greatly indebted to him. His music is a priceless enrichment to the Catholic Church—Cherubini is as a Raphael and Angelo thereto.

Certain critics have accused Cherubini of being over dramatic in his sacred compositions. Judging his music by the side of the church music of Palestrina, Carissimi, Allegri, Marcello, and such maestri, the charge might be supported; but Cherubini had a higher mission than these, his predecessors. They had divested their sacred music of every vestige of warm colouring, and, as Fétis says, they had treated it “as an emanation of pure sentiment, stripped of all human passion.” The structure which they had reared was, indeed, finely conceived, pure in its style, and severely correct, but its walls were bare and it needed colour, it wanted life and emotional effects. It was the mission of Cherubini to supply such deficiencies. The Florentine stepped in, and showed how possible it was to blend the severe beauties of counterpoint and fugue with dramatic expression, sustained by every wealth of instrumentation. As he gave soul, expression, and feeling to Opera, so he did to Mass and Credo.

Cherubini's first important Mass, the one in F for three voices and orchestra, properly catalogued as No. 4 (the earlier numbered masses being reckoned as juvenile compositions), was brought to light in the year 1809. In the autumn of that year Cherubini was seeking repose in the quiet village of Chimay,¹ and there it was that the *Kyrie*¹ and Gloria of this fine work were first performed, and this with perhaps the poorest array of talent that Cherubini had ever met.

¹ Here was the residence of M. le Prince de Chimay, whither Cherubini had been invited to rest and recruit—a guest of the cultured owner of the castle.

Cherubini had dropped music, and was given over for a season to his favourite pursuit of botany. The collecting of specimens of the vegetable kingdom, an inquiry into their growth and natural history, afforded him a pleasurable occupation, and one which he entered into with his usual ardent spirit. It was at this time that the project was formed in the village for performing a mass with music in Chimay Church. All available throats and lungs were ready to get up the music, but—this was not in existence! In their plight they had recourse to Cherubini, who considered, then refused, considered again, and finally consented. Putting aside specimens of plants and roots, he turned on to the composition of a three-voice Mass. The movements required were duly completed, and performed on the day of the long-looked-for festival.

For the voices there was a village choir, and the full instrumental strength was not more formidable than one bassoon, a single flute, two horns, two clarionets, and a string quartet.

With so unpretentious an orchestra it is somewhat surprising that the performance proved an adequate musical offering to St. Cecilia, in whose honour it was arranged. Yet the Patroness of Music appears to have been kind, and altogether so favourable an impression was left upon Cherubini, that he was subsequently induced to extend and to complete the score which had been executed in part only by these villagers—the natives of Chimay.

¹ Some writers say this Kyrie was written in the billiard-room at the castle during the playing of pool and billiards

A performance of the completed Mass took place shortly afterwards at the Hôtel de Babylon in Paris,¹ when the instrumental parts were rendered by men of accepted talent and ability. The Mass was received with enthusiasm by the dilettanti who crowded the salon of Prince de Chimay's town residence, and connoisseurs pronounced it a masterpiece, the first work of a new era in the annals of sacred musical art.

A detailed description of this fine contribution to Roman Church music will be to many unnecessary. It is not Cherubini's greatest and most famous work, his Requiem Mass in C minor being held to bear that honour; while some admirers of the master refer to the D minor Requiem as his chef-d'œuvre; also in some respects the F Mass music must give way to that masterly composition, the Mass in A (to be spoken of further on), so concise, finely conceived, and eminently beautiful in its melody, harmony, and general design.

It is nevertheless a grand effort, this F Mass. Its general treatment, its devotional character, its learning, the originality and exquisite beauty of much of the music make it worthy to rank with similar art forms by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. Fétis declares it to be so remarkable for originality of idea and perfection of style, as to be superior to the masses by these masters. The Kyrie of 200 bars length abounds in beautiful music of a suppressed emotional character—not heavily orchestrated, but delicately and charmingly accompanied, and abounding in varied and choice devices of the contrapuntal art. The Credo, grand in its conception, and with music bold and vigorous enough especially in the emphatic passages of the text, is well calculated to stimulate the believer. In the Incarnatus and Crucifixus this character is changed. Love beyond expression, tenderness, and deep religious fervour prevail upon the worshipper, and concentrate the mind upon this supreme point of doctrinal acceptance.

¹ This was in 1809.

Not less masterly is the Allegro movement wherein Christ's Resurrection is depicted, and this movement is followed by a fugue; so strong in subject and character, and worked out in so masterly a fashion as to form a brilliant finale to this setting of the Creed. The Sanctus of 105 bars length, well conceived and replete with beautiful and melodious music, has a religious and a subdued colouring throughout, and it would serve well as a model to modern church musicians, who in seeking after effect too often lose sight of the very words, to say nothing of the spirit, of their text. The Agnus Dei and Gloria are correspondingly treated, and are worthy in all respects of the other grand music of this Mass—a work which is specially important as being the first, if not the finest sacred work of Cherubini's Third or mature period in composition.

Concerning this Mass it has been said—"The prevailing idea in this effort has nothing in common with that which pervades all the music of the ancient Roman school; that was conceived as an emanation of pure sentiment, apart from all human passion; while Cherubini, on the contrary, chose that his music should express a dramatic sense of the words, and in the fulfilment of this idea, he gave proof of a talent so exalted as to leave him without rival in this particular."

Passing over such works as the Litanie della Vergine for four voices with instruments—written for His Highness Prince Esterhazy de Galanta, a part of a Cantata, various Romances and other small pieces, we come to the year 1811, famous as being that in which Cherubini composed his grand Mass in D minor.

This Mass, if not Cherubini's chef-d'œuvre, is one of the most masterly results ever obtained in the field of sacred composition. Written¹ for four voices and full orchestra, it is some 260 pages of score in length—and this circumstance is an unfortunate one, since it must ever seriously prejudice the frequent performance of this fine work in its entirety.

What prompted Cherubini to compose a Mass which is one of the longest—indeed the longest ever written, is difficult to conceive.² Certainly it cannot be urged that Cherubini had no other means of display. Whether we look at the music of the D minor Mass, and judge it as music per se, or regard the work from the standpoint of its conception, its originality, its well-planned and well-executed design, the mind is equally impressed. Musically and technically it is surpassed by no similar work by any other master.

¹ This Mass was begun at the end of March and finished 7th October, 1811.

² It contains 2563 bars of music. Beethoven's longest Mass—the celebrated D major—consists of 1929 bars.

The Kyrie¹ is divided into three sections, which combine to constitute one of the grandest settings of these words of the Roman service. True, there are frequent repetitions of passages, the same sentiment is over and over again expressed; subject succeeds subject with almost dangerous frequency, and yet, when Cherubini gathers together these forces, a vast musical structure is the result. The three sections blend into a perfect whole—gorgeous in its instrumental colouring, rich in flow of melody, and as chaste and rare in its detail as the severest theorist could desire. There is grandeur, strength, and depth, and these qualities are not acquired to the exclusion of appropriate sentiment, varied harmony, or original thought and treatment. Nor has Cherubini lost sight of the fit character of a Kyrie Eleison. From beginning to end this movement in the D minor Mass is one long musical prayer—a plea for divine mercy, beautifully yet devoutly expressed, and not less reverential in character because of the gorgeous musical apparel in which it is clothed; for in his sacred music, Cherubini rarely, if ever, allows his art to exceed its legitimate mission—that of impelling and encouraging the worshipper, stimulating such an one in his religious aspirations, rather than seeking to chain him to consideration of sounds of man's creating.

In the third movement of this Kyrie (in common time, allegro moderato) Cherubini has introduced a fugue in the most successful manner—not a boisterous example of this form of writing, but one so appropriately worked out, with voices and instruments so well kept under, and with the sentiment and colouring so truly compatible with the religious situation, that the most devout worshipper could suffer no disturbance.

¹ 437 bars in length.

The *Gloria*¹ is not less finely conceived. Its brilliant and effective opening, followed by the striking contrast on the words, “And in earth peace,” could scarcely fail to arrest the attention, while to any willing listener, and still more to the devout mind, sensible to musical form and beauty, it would appeal with particular impressiveness. The singular beauty, too, of the Qui Tollis and Quoniam carries them out of the region of pen and ink description. The music wedded to these is music which must last as long, at least, as there is vitality in the Roman Church.

The Credo—668 bars in length—is the musical climax of the work. In it are all the qualities which combine to make a grand conception—well balanced change of movement, happily judged variety both in colour and sentiment, alterations in time and key, consummate contrapuntal form both broad and in detail, all this carried on by a current of pure melody, superbly harmonized, and sustaining a pent-up interest until the final chord. Great, too, as is the general interest, Cherubini in the Incarnatus movement even heightens the normal effect, tiding over this solemn part of the Credo with consummate skill. In the

¹ 895 bars in length.

Crucifixus the mighty master produces a beautiful effect by a sustained unison passage for the voices on E, supported by a delicate and weird accompaniment from the violins muted. The endorsing "Amen" is the signal for a great point. On this word Cherubini builds a noble fugue. The giant theorist, never at a loss for a fugal subject, has here surpassed himself in finding the initial bars of a fugue, which, well worked out as it is, forms a fitting conclusion to an eminently grand setting of this portion of the Mass.

The Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei are movements equal in all respects to their preceding numbers. Nothing in music could exceed the striking originality of the Sanctus, while for a true musical inspiration the student may well turn to the 130 bars of beautiful harmonies and melody which constitute the Benedictus. The expressive Agnus Dei is full of pathos and religious sentiment. The imploring tones to the Lamb of God for 'mercy,' and reiterated appeals for the grant of peace were surely never more tenderly and religiously expressed through the medium of music.

The Mass in C (No. 6) appeared with the year 1816. Compared with so gigantic a work as its predecessor, the D minor, it is a small Mass, containing no more than sixty-five pages or so of MS.; nevertheless, it is written for four voices with full orchestra, and includes an Offertory, a Laudate Dominum, and an O Salutaris.

The shortness of this Mass in C and others of a similar character is to be accounted for in this wise. The services at the King's Chapel (for which Cherubini by virtue of his office as Superintendent had to furnish the music) were not remarkable for their length, and rather than protract the devotions of the Court Cherubini had to limit the whole of a Mass to the space which he personally would have preferred to allot to one movement. Nevertheless, the brevity of these works is more than atoned for by the remarkable truly soul-stirring beauty of their music.

The Kyrie of the C¹ Mass is a chaste movement, more noteworthy for the purity of the vocal writing, and the clever blending of the voices, than for any great orchestral effects or startling harmonies. It ends peacefully enough, and leads to a Gloria wherein the same sentiment and colouring are hardly dispelled. The music moves leisurely on, there is no lashing of huge tone-waves, no heaving of mighty forces of wind and string, Cherubini seems resting from his Herculean efforts in the D minor Mass. There is, however, a suggestion of pent-up strength in the opening bars of the fine Credo. The deliberate scale passage (Allegro maestoso) in G major (the key of the movement), followed by the voices on the words Patrem Omnipotentem, is bold to a degree, and gives a swing and freedom to the music which are maintained up to the exquisite Incarnatus movement, which latter is led off slowly by first and second soprani and alti in a beautiful passage of three-part voice writing. The Crucifixus is subdued and solemn in character—indeed, it is so shrouded that the bright and triumphant tones of the "Et Resurrexit" are welcome theologically and musically. The close of the Credo is original and very striking, the intermingled *sol*i and chorus on the word "Amen" being skilful and effective in the extreme.

¹ The third Mass composed by Cherubini in this key.

The Sanctus, O Salutaris, and Agnus Dei—worthy parts of this beautiful Mass—are thoroughly characteristic of their composer, being clear in outline, pure in harmony, fresh and life-giving in melodic vigour and fancy. Some authorities think most highly of this work. Mr. Bellasis, in his "Memorials of Cherubini," says that "Cherubini never wrote anything more thoroughly spontaneous." Gineod, the French critic, speaking of this work, says he was aware of musicians who preferred it to any other of Cherubini's Masses.

Still there are other grand Masses from the fertile pen of this musician. The one known as No. 7 in the key of E flat for full orchestra and voices, was composed by Cherubini in the year 1816. It served its purpose in the King's Chapel, till it was replaced in 1818 by the Mass in E (No. 8) for four voices with full orchestral accompaniment. In 1819 the Mass in G (No. 9) appeared. This was composed for the crowning of Louis XVIII. As a concise work, for the beauty of its music, for the general treatment of its several parts, this First "Coronation" Mass would alone be sufficient to win for its composer an enduring fame as a master in this form of composition. The lengths of the several movements in this Mass are as follows:—Kyrie 101 bars; Gloria 503 bars; Credo 435 bars; Sanctus 105 bars; and Agnus Dei 61 bars.

The B flat Mass (No. 10)¹ came with the year 1821, and four years afterwards the prolific genius brought forward the magnificent work which he composed when Charles X. became King of France in 1825. This is one of the best of Cherubini's works, abounding as it does in points of interest both to the musician and amateur.

"Mass in A, Coronation (No. 11), for three parts," is the description of this latter work as given in the catalogue of Cherubini's writings.

All authorities justly place it high in the list of sacred compositions. Thus Girod in his Treatise De la Musique Religieuse terms it, "the most beautiful of Cherubini's Masses." The Kyrie he describes as simple and touching, well characterized, full of loving and confiding sentiments. "The Credo," continues the same authority, "is a creation so original that it would be futile to search elsewhere for any resemblance to it." Berlioz, too, speaks of this Mass in the highest terms of praise. Inviting special attention to its Communion March, he says:—"It is a mystical expression in all its purity, contemplation, and Catholic ecstasy. . . . This piece breathes only of Divine Love, of faith without doubt, of calm, of the serenity of a soul in the presence of its Creator; no earthly sound comes to mar its heavenly quiet, and it brings tears to the eyes of those who listen to it. . . . If ever the word "sublime" has had a true and just application, it is a propos of Cherubini's "Communion March."

It was first performed in the Cathedral at Rheims

¹ Composed for the King's Chapel; for four voices in chorus and full score.

upon the auspicious occasion of the Coronation of Charles X.

Cherubini wrote other Church music. Passing over the many Hymns, Antiphons, Motets, Litanies, and detached service pieces too numerous to enumerate here, there came two scores, without some reference to which this and any memoir of this classic musician would be singularly incomplete. These are his Requiems.

The one in C minor was composed in the year 1816. The Anniversary of King Louis XVIth's death was required to be celebrated, and this Requiem was composed for this purpose. It was first performed in the Abbey Church of St. Denis on the 21st January, 1817.

It stands musically among the finest compositions of its class. Grand and stately in outline, it yet contains a wealth of detail, and a richness of natural musical scholarship and original power. No capable critic could listen to a performance of this work in its entirety without becoming fully impressed with its magnificence. Its appropriate colouring, the solemn grandeur of its movements, the religious fervour which pervades the whole, combine to make a great and lasting impression on the mind imbued with musical sympathy.

"The Requiem in C minor," remarks Berlioz, is on the whole the greatest work of its author. No other production of this grand master can bear any comparison with it for abundance of idea, fulness of form, and sustained sublimity of style. The Agnus Dei in decrescendo surpasses everything that has ever been written of the kind. The workmanship of this portion, too, has an inestimable value, the vocal style is sharp and clear, the instrumentation coloured and powerful, yet ever worthy of its object." Altogether this work stands a striking example of sacred exposition combined with consummate contrapuntal knowledge and skill, while it shows also how thoroughly its composer had studied and become imbued with the style of Palestrina, adapting it in felicitous manner to his own individual musical thought and expression.

Most modern Mass music which the great masters of the art have given birth to belongs to one grand epoch in the history of the Mass form. This is the imaginative and dramatic era, and to this Cherubini's Requiems undoubtedly also belong. In the D minor Requiem notably has Cherubini become imbued with dramatic fervour, and this at places is so developed that the devotional element appears to some minds to be lacking.

A predominating character in these Requiems—indeed, in all Cherubini's Masses, however—is the strong touch and colouring of Cherubini's pure and noble style; and this pervading element conduces to a sense of complete satisfaction and sacredness of purpose whenever the devotional mind has the accessory aid of such soul-permeating harmony as the master musician now under notice has bequeathed to his Church.

With this work Cherubini made peace with the Royalists at the return of the Bourbons.

Cherubini's second Requiem (in D minor)¹ may, perhaps, be fitly described as his last great score—a worthy crowning point of a long life—for its composer was close on fourscore when he finished the work. According to the catalogue of Cherubini's works it was composed between February and September, 1836, so that its composer was seventy-six years old when he began it, and at its completion had just entered upon his seventy-seventh year. Remembering this fact, the composition becomes at once a notable instance of sustained musical capacity, since it is doubtful whether its composer's great power and genius were ever seen to better advantage than in this magnificent composition. Strangely enough this Requiem was not performed in its entirety until some two years afterwards.

¹ Composed for three men's voices—two tenors and bass. Original M.S. consisted of 88 pages full score.

The Dies Iræ number was first given at a concert at the Conservatoire on 19th March, 1837. The work was first heard in its entirety on the 25th March, 1838, since which time it has been more than once given at Roman Catholic services in this country.

"It is impossible," writes Mr. Bellasis in his "Memorials of Cherubini," "to hear or study this almost unapproachable composition without feeling how intimately impressed the author must have been with the whole spirit of prayerful, earnest, mournful supplication implied in the idea of the Christian Sacrifice for the Dead." And this is no doubt true. If Cherubini ever wrote inspiring music, if he ever soared into the very heaven of Art, it is in the music of this Requiem. Elsewhere he has been masterly, grand, and learned, but, in no previous work, not even in the D minor Mass or the C minor Requiem has he risen from the earthly and poured forth sublimer music—more inspired than created—than is to be met with in this last Requiem. For appropriate sentiment, effectiveness in its harmonic combinations, for conciseness, conception, and masterly treatment Cherubini's D minor Requiem stands unsurpassed by any similar work.¹

To do justice to the score in detail would be out of place in the small compass of the present biographical sketch. Yet the student is reminded that it would afford him or her a profitable study to analyze thoroughly this perfect piece of musical craftsmanship; to note each beautiful phrase, to instance the many ravishing melodies, the successions of grand chords, and cleverly disposed discords, and then to feast in the admiration of those mighty crescendo effects and striking contrasts of the tone art, of which Cherubini in this Requiem especially has proved himself so completely the master. Every student would do well to acquaint himself with this work, so as to become familiarized with the beauties of a score which ranks among the grandest of sacred musical compositions.

There is not a movement in this famous composition which is not especially noteworthy for its treatment, and which might not be cited in illustration of the masterly musical conception and declaration on the part of its illustrious author. Versed in the traditions of his creed, the first sounds that are heard in this sublime composition are tones which it has been well said "have breathed a prayer of rest for the departed ever since the day when the first Gregorian Mass for the dead was sung." These occur on the word "Requiem"; but that the reader and student may the better realize the devotional spirit of this Introitus movement a direct acquaintance with the score must be urged.

¹ Mendelssohn greatly admired this Requiem Mass, and in 1838 recommended it to the notice of the Committee of the Lower Rhine Musical Festival for performance thereat.

The second movement, the Graduale, sung after the Epistle, and with voices unaccompanied, is sweet and placid—music like the streaks of gold which break the heavenly cloudland.

All this is in striking contrast to the terrific opening of the Dies Iræ, which follows—a movement so wondrous, so stupendous and sublime in its grandeur as to deeply impress the mind whenever it is rendered.

Taken as a whole, this Dies Iræ number has rarely, if ever, been equalled in the domain of sacred art. The opening passage leading up to the crash of voices as they give the words Dies iræ in the fourth bar is a point of matchless art achievement. Not less remarkable is the strength and solidity of the unisons on the words Tuba mirum, with the brilliant outburst upon the A major chord and the flight of the upper voice to the top A. With thrilling effect, too, is the passage Rex tremendæ majestatis treated, until it loses its gigantic energy in the soft and placid music, sung mezza voce to the words Recordare Jesu. The Lacrimosa dies illa is a soul-stirring, slow movement leading on to a subdued ending to the word Amen.

The Offertorium is remarkable alike for its varied and vigorous character and its beautiful harmony.

The Fugal idea at the words Quam olim Abrahamæ, brief as it is, emphasizes the slow beauty of the Hostias et preces tibi music, which in its turn is varied by a thrilling Allegro Vivo passage, which brings the movement to a glorious termination. The remaining movements, the Sanctus, Pie Jesu and Agnus Dei, are replete with the most beautiful and appropriate music. In the Sanctus a prodigious effect is gained in the treatment of the word "Hosanna."

The Pie Jesu number is an excellent illustration of Cherubini's pure grace and contrapuntal ingenuity in quietest mood, and comes in welcome contrast to the mighty tonal outbursts in the Sanctus. The Agnus Dei opens boldly in the D minor key, but soon its master composer rises with magnificent force, and the whole vocal and instrumental strength is requisitioned at the point Lux Æterna—so effective, so awe-inspiring, as to almost unnerve the listener. Then there is calm. Slower and sweeter become the strains, until finally all dies away. All seems to have drifted upwards to realms of restful bliss.

Some writers assert that "the absence of female voices in this Mass was a concession to the Church dignitaries of the Restoration, who, influenced by the bigotry of former periods, wished to exclude female voices from all Church music." Cherubini was hardly the man, however, to be approached, or to apply himself, after such a fashion. A devoted and faithful son of his Church, nothing in the shape of a "concession" would have been asked or expected of him. The planning of the D minor Requiem for male voices only was a deliberate art plan. The composer himself, doubtless, sensible of the mould and character of men's voices, as well as of the nature which such a work should partake, preferred the darker colourings obtainable in matured male voices. Designed as the D minor Requiem was with some view to his own funeral, Cherubini was moved probably to give it as sombre and grave a tone as possible. It must be allowed that it is pitched throughout in a singularly suggestive and mournful key.

Much as has been said already of the works of Cherubini, only his principal writings have been touched upon. His vast musical thought and activity, his great prolificness—one of the surest signs of genius—is seen in the full length catalogue of his works. In all, there are more than four hundred and thirty compositions, including 23 Operas, 11 Masses, 11 Cantatas, 10 Sonatas, 7 Motets, 2 Requiems, 20 Antiphons, 36 Hymns, 3 Psalms, 1 Oratorio, 1 Symphony, 48 Romanzas; between 60 and 70 detached Airs, 15 Nocturnes, 14 detached Kyries, 6 Instrumental Quartets, 4 Litanies, 4 Rondos, 3 detached Sanctus, 4 Odes, 11 Marches, a Quintet for Instruments, 11 Dances, 14 Choruses, 14 Duets, 9 Terzettos, 7 Pas Redoublés, 5 Canons, 5 Opera finales, 4 sets of Solfeggi, 4 Recitatives, 2 Madrigals, 2 detached Agnus Dei, 1 Overture, 1 Pianoforte Fantasia, a Course of Composition, 1 set of Canzonets, 2 detached Credos, a Sextet for voices, and a host of smaller pieces for the church, stage, and concert room.

DEATH AND RETROSPECT.

ON one of the endmost days of November, 1830, the aged master, Cherubini, stood at the grave of his beloved confrère Catel, but the memory of his Adieu, mon bien aimé Catel! had scarcely faded ere the old man was bidden to pay the final tribute of affection at the grave of yet another equally dear to him. In 1834 Boieldieu died, and, cold as was the morning, Cherubini roused himself early to see the last of a favourite pupil, one whom he loved well, and with whom he had worked long. "Gentlemen," said Cherubini at the grave, "it is not long ago since we accompanied here the remains of our fellow-worker, Catel; to-day we have to mourn the premature death of our very dear friend Boieldieu." That such partings should remind him of his own advanced years is certain. "I shall write a Requiem for myself to which there will be no objection," he is reported to have said, upon the authorities refusing the performance of his "O minor" at Boieldieu's funeral. But the hale Cherubini clung tenaciously to his duties at the Conservatoire. The loss of his colleagues gradually passed over amid the wear and tear of every-day life among the Conservatoire scholars, and the veteran musician, now in his old days, loved by many and respected by all, seemed to grow young again. This, however, was but a transient state. In 1841 there came the shock of the death of his son-in-law. The blow was too heavy a one for the old man. Cherubini never recovered himself. With the beginning of 1842 Cherubini resigned his post as Director of the Conservatoire, sensible, perhaps, that his end was not far off. This proved to be the case. Early in March increased weakness set in; he became confined to his room, and saw none save his family and most intimate friends. Finally he took to his bed, where he remained until he passed away at the bid of Death on the 15th March, 1842. He reached the good old age of eighty-two. His obsequies were held at the Church of St. Roch, when was performed his Requiem for three men's voices, a work he wrote after the ecclesiastical authorities had prohibited (because it contained female voice parts) the performance of the Requiem he composed for the funeral of Boieldieu. Over three thousand mourners and friends attended the funeral. Student and Professor of the Conservatoire joined in the procession, which was made up of persons of all ranks. To his own music—the solemn strains of a Funeral March which he had lovingly composed upon the occasion of the obsequies of General Hoche—all that was mortal of Cherubini was conveyed to its long resting-place in the cemetery of Père la Chaise.

Cherubini's death was instantly felt. — All France rose to do him honour at the last. She gave him an imposing funeral; all her great sons wrote of him; streets were named after him; his name, his virtues, abilities, and talent were cut in marble; his own countrymen and the Florentines erected monuments to him—in short, everything was done to perpetuate the memory of a great son of art who had won the good wishes of every citizen, and who commanded the admiration of every musical mind.

The daily round of the life of this eminent man was marked by much that must have proved depressing and disappointing to his artist mind. From the outset he had a hard struggle, and it was not until he was verging upon sixty years of age, that honour, position, or income came in his path. During all his young life his pecuniary condition was anything but satisfactory, and he had before him the task not only of earning a livelihood, but of remedying what he conceived to be abuses in art; while beyond all were the larger reforms, especially in Opera, which filled his mind.

The position was one with conflicting features. He might soon have improved his exchequer had he been minded to drag his art down to the level which was required to make him a popular composer. Had he pandered to the vox populi and perhaps the publishers, he could probably have dived down deep into their pockets; while, had he lived in such favoured times as now, a few "pot-boilers," such as divinely gifted composers do not disdain to write, would have spared him every care or thought about serious art.

All this, however, was incompatible with the temper of the man, and with that mission which he felt to be his—a mission which he ultimately accomplished.

Thus he went on for many years, hampered and harassed in his musical schemes with petty financial troubles, which a generous hand might easily have alleviated.

While yet a comparatively poor and unsuccessful man, Cherubini, notwithstanding his pecuniary disadvantages, took to himself his wife, and this step we may conclude could scarcely have improved matters.

In 1795, when he was in his thirty-fifth year, the Conservatoire de Musique was founded, and Cherubini was appointed one of three Inspectors of Tuition. He perforce accepted the post, albeit it was not one to his liking. He had reason for discontentment. He had laboured long and worthily for the betterment of French music, and no one capable of judging doubted either his claims or capacity for a more responsible and remunerative appointment. His reputation and the love he had for his profession entitled him to higher recognition.

A formidable figure, however, had long stood in Cherubini's path, none other than Napoleon. The great Consul disliked Cherubini, and showed it, and the great musician took no pains to diminish the aversion. In his career of conquest which was to make despotism universal throughout Europe, Buonaparte had effected the crushing defeat at Austerlitz, and though this and similar expeditions kept Cherubini employed in the construction of war music, it banished all hopes of his settling at Vienna, where a congenial sphere appeared to be opening out for him. How preferable this latter would have been to the work of organizing and conducting Napoleon's soirées at Schönbrunn—from which no good could accrue either to art or artist—may be imagined.

What was the cause of this dislike between soldier and musician is not very clear. Possibly Napoleon had not forgotten Cherubini's settings of the Republican songs of the stormy days which preceded the Consulate and Empire, or Napoleon may have been moved by purely artistic motives, for, as we shall see, he was one day gracious enough to indicate to Cherubini the kind of music that pleased and exactly suited his taste.

One honour Napoleon did bestow upon Cherubini—he made him Chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur. This was during the Hundred Days.

The abdication of Buonaparte, the restoration of the Bourbons in the person of Louis XVIII., brought sunshine along the path of the long-neglected musician. Almost at once did riches and honour and advancement become his portion. Recognition came from all quarters. The King smiled upon him, he was elected a member of the Institut, and now the post of Musician and Superintendent of the King's chapel looked like falling to his lot, for Martini, its previous occupant, had died.

As a fact the post was speedily offered to Cherubini, but eventually he shared it jointly with Lesueur, who had held it with Martini under the former régime.

A creditable story is connected with this incident, and as it affords an instance of exceptional consideration, as between artist and artist, I submit it for the consideration of contemporary professors, without much fear that it will be too often emulated, for, in music as the profession is nowadays, there are few men as generously minded as Cherubini proved himself to be, and given these, it still becomes necessary to find colleagues worthy to be treated as he treated Lesueur. In 1816 the King's first gentleman-in-waiting inquired for Cherubini, and submitted to him the King's pleasure as to the post. "Monseigneur," said Cherubini in reply, "Monsieur Lesueur, my friend, is more worthy than I am of this high position. If I had not a young family to bring up, if I were rich, I should refuse it altogether; but if his Majesty is willing to allow me to share with Lesueur the superintendence of his music, I will accept it with thankfulness." The King consenting to this arrangement, Cherubini shared the office with Lesueur at a salary for himself of 3000 francs per annum.

Further honours were yet in store for him. The Philharmonic Society of London, which had only recently been formed, came forward and offered Cherubini the sum of £200 for a Symphony, an Overture, and a composition for the voice. This was in 1815. It need hardly be said that Cherubini fulfilled the contract to every one's satisfaction. The Symphony in D and Overture in G were performed on the 1st of May and the 3rd of April respectively, and have ever since been regarded as exceptionally attractive musical productions by the habitués of these concerts.

In 1822 he was promoted to the Directorship of the Paris Conservatoire. His duties in this capacity were such as he delighted in, and he threw his whole energies into the work of raising the standard of the teaching given.

For years and years—indeed, until within a short time of his death—he remained at this post; alternating his useful and conscientious labours in instructing and guiding others with some composition on his own account. Thus was brought to light some of the interesting items which embellish the latter portion of the lengthy catalogue of works from the pen of this truly great and justly esteemed master of musical art.

THE INFLUENCE OF CHERUBINI UPON MUSIC.

DRAMATIC MUSIC.

IN estimating the influence of Cherubini upon French art or music in general, one very important point needs to be touched upon; namely, the precise dates between which the composer's career extends. Except with close readers a rambling uncertainty prevails as to the exact whereabouts in musical chronology of this talented son of art. When his name is mentioned the minds of many people wander back to the Scarlatti and Stradella epoch, and not a few enemies to literal dates are bold enough to tack the great contrapuntist's life close on to that musical age when Palestrina was swaying his severe and noble order of art. Not so. Old habitués and amateurs can almost touch hands with Cherubini, since he died only nine years before the year of the Great Exhibition in 1851, or two years after the wedding of Queen Victoria. Let the mind, then, become impressed with the fact that Cherubini is comparatively a modern man, far removed from the dark musical ages to which the careless and superficial enthusiast too often relegates the man and his works.

There exist, at least, three distinct standpoints from which the student and reader may endeavour to gauge any influence of this master. These would involve the consideration of his influence upon Opera; a contemplation of his labours in the field of Sacred musical art; and finally, some thoughts concerning the effect he exercised as a Teacher and moulder of the musical tendencies of those who had the advantage of his personal tuition.

It is upon the French School of Music that we should expect to find the influence of Cherubini most perceptible, for though an Italian by birth and musical education, he became closely identified with French art, rather than that of his own country. Writers, too, always—though unnecessarily—associate him with the French school.

In Cherubini's day there was not a little art matériel in France upon which to set his impress. A hundred years before his eyes first met the blue Florentine sky, Opera had had its rise in the French capital, under the auspices of Cardinal Mazarin. Cambert, a Parisian organist, had produced the first French opera, La Pastorale, and then came Lully, erst kitchen scullion, who rose to be chief musician to Louis XIV. Lully did away with some of the everlasting airs and duets of the imported Italian style of opera, and in their place extended the chorus, introduced the ballet, and originated the overture. Rameau appeared with further improvements by way of greater variety both of harmony and melody in the vocal and band parts, besides instituting that now world-famed art species, the comic opera or opera-bouffe. Grétry followed, and gave a decided French character to the national music. He readily caught and turned to account all the subtle points of expression and humour in his libretti, while his piquant and original melody, together with a continued expansion of the orchestra, led to much of the verve and elasticity which has characterized French opera ever since. The development of comic opera was far more marked than grand opera, and while one seemed to hit the popular taste, the other awaited the advent of musicians of the stamp of Cherubini, Halévy, Meyerbeer, and Berlioz, men with the capacity to present this art feature with all that richness of ensemble and surrounding without which it might have appealed to the French people in vain. As it is, serious opera has taken no great hold upon the French people. Meyerbeer is the chief composer beyond Cherubini who has identified himself with opera seria, and his unparalleled success was due in a large measure to gorgeous externals. Other modern men, all, save Gounod, have laboured in the light and frivolous vein of opera-bouffe, or something closely akin to it.

Another composer who has left his mark upon the dramatic music of France was Piccini. He was writing operas before Cherubini was born, and, settling in Paris in 1776, he gave himself up to the task of re-establishing Italian opera upon the old lines, as opposed to the new ideas and reforms which Gluck (1714-1787) was promulgating. These reforms of Gluck's tended towards a general simplicity, an avoidance of difficulties tending to indistinctness, greater subserviency of the music to the poetry, and the ex-tion of much in the way of melodic redundancy, together with other abuses attaching to Italian opera of the day.

Thus, dramatic music was no unknown art quantity in France when Cherubini appeared as Gluck the Second, a champion of fresh reforms ere the air was well cleared of the smoke from the famous Gluck and Piccini "war." It was Gluck's work which Cherubini felt impelled to carry on. He was a born purist; his training under strict and legitimate mastership accentuated this; and throughout his long career he departed not from the lofty and noble walk of art which he chose out for himself. According to Gluck, "the mission of music was not merely to afford gratification to the senses," but to become the vehicle of expression of the moral qualities. With this Cherubini quite coincided; and although the French people heard the exposition of the dogma, time has proved that France has really been unimpressible to the teachings of both Gluck and Cherubini.

The national taste in France was decidedly towards flimsy comic opera, as it has been ever since; and, previous to Cherubini, grand opera in its true sense had received little attention from composers. This was owing partly to the national temperament, partly to the fickleness of public taste, and not a little of the preference for a light style of Opera might be traced to political causes. War was in the air. Ever and anon men and women were restless with political excitement. Serious plays and still more thoughtful cadences were ill adapted to such an age and national obstacles, determined to give effect to his convictions as to a reasonable and an elevated musical drama. Démophon was prepared, and this was his initial step in the work of founding a grand style of French opera. Old Italian habit, force and tradition, all were forsaken for a style of purer and sterner mould. Lodoïska, more advanced in the new fashion, followed, and with its unusual harmonic combinations and instrumental effects, both startling and brilliant, staggered public and musicians alike. Both works had novel features in the improved treatment of the choruses, in the form of the concerted pieces, and in the concise arrangement of the finales and principal movements; while compassing all was a surrounding of noble expression hitherto unknown in French stage music. In Medée, that powerful imagination which belonged to Cherubini more than to French stage composers before him, is even more decidedly expressed. This opera, as is known, abounds with music of the most passionate character, always subjugated by that pure, classic idealism which tempered its composer's musical vein. Yet, as if to dare on the score of versatility, in a subsequent opera, Les Deux Journées, he effected an entire change of front. In this great score, which is something of a connecting link between opera seria and opera comique, is presented a domestic story of thrilling interest. The composer is both at the height of his dramatic powers and the fulness of idyllic realization. The work reveals itself as a chapter out of real life, and all is painted in a simple, unadorned—if picturesque—way. Nowhere has Cherubini been more true to life, seldom has he presented a more joyous picture than in the Deux Journées. It has been called the "master-piece of comic opera," so enjoyable is its music, while a great critic says of it, "The situations are as serious, and the incidents are as interesting as any story of domestic interest ever set; and the choral writing and the orchestral colouring are as vivid and graphic as any to be found in Mozart and Meyerbeer." All this the French people had placed before them. What was and has been the result?

Of the reception in their day of these principal among the operatic works of Cherubini we have already read. What has been their bearing upon French dramatic art since?

It must be allowed that the influence of Cherubini upon French Opera has thus far been but temporary. In his capacity as Chief of the Conservatoire he imbued many notable students there with his views and aims, and some of this teaching necessarily reflected itself in the styles of the eminent among such scholars. But one and all supplanted their mentor in the estimation of the French public. He took no lasting hold on the hearts of the French people, and it is only for historians to confess that it was in Germany that Cherubini's works found the most enduring appreciation in their composer's lifetime and since.

To look beyond French dramatic music for any sign of his art sway is equally unnecessary. If he remained unimitated in France it is unlikely that his style and teachings would be appreciably adopted in Italy or Germany—the former given over as it was to melodic indulgence to excess; the latter already in possession of a national dramatic art, having much in common with the Cherubini style, and only needing the romantic touches of a Weber to place it absolutely beyond the pale of the impressionable from without.

As a fact, Cherubini has exercised no durable bearing upon the lyrical music of either France, Germany, or Italy, any more than he has affected the dramatic music of the English lyric stage. He was, however, both understood and highly esteemed in Germany, not only by the people at large, but by individual masters of the art. Beethoven regarded him as the greatest opera composer then living, and when, in 1805, Cherubini arrived in Vienna to fulfil an engagement to write an opera, the two masters not only became close friends, but the great symphonist allowed his vocal music to be largely influenced by Cherubini's style, and, what is more, was not ashamed to own it. To this day Cherubini is more to Germany than to France. Under the title of the Wasserträger the Deux Journées is well known upon German opera boards, while in Vienna this same opera and Medée are often performed to the delight of the thoroughly musical public of that city.

As an opera composer, then, let it be finally admitted that Cherubini made no permanent impression upon the French lyric stage. Writers affirm that he created Méhul, Lesueur, Spontini, Halévy, etc., which to an extent is true, but it would be both inaccurate and misleading to say that he founded a school, or that in Cherubini could be recognized one whose works and style had been copied to any great extent by any succeeding composer. Doubtless his operas found many admirers—even Haydn and Beethoven were such—but they rarely served as models for lesser French composers, who for the most part were bent upon hitting the popular taste of their day with a form of art less stately in form and bereft of much of that pure idealism which stood a stumbling-block between the lofty-minded composer of Medée and a too ecstatic public.

In Germany Cherubini, although he did not influence the national art, made some temporary fame as a successful essayist in reformed dramatic art. The gigantic lyric creations of Mozart already existed: albeit it has been declared that had there been no Deux Journées the Fidelio would never have been written, Beethoven being inspired not less by Cherubini than was the latter by Mozart. If, therefore, the beautiful and classical score of Les Deux Journées prompted Fidelio only, the world of music has much for which to thank Cherubini. Happily there is more. Many maintain that in this masterpiece—the Deux Journées—Cherubini created the late Wagnerian theories of operatic treatment, since there is no aria d'entrata for prima donna, tenor, baritone, or bass; while no solos interrupt the action of the drama. "Every character is individualized, and has a marked type, each one contributing to the concerted pieces faithfully, consistently, and coherently." It is incontrovertible, moreover, that in this opera Cherubini struck the first blow in the system for annihilating the tyranny of leading singers in operas—quite an accepted Wagnerian theory.

Mention has been made of the leading features of Cherubini's operas. It only remains to say that most of them were written for the French lyric stage. In his principal operas he sought out a new path. He discovered his road in Démophon, and he confirmed this in Lodoïska and his later operas. His improved operatic style partook chiefly of greater variety in harmonic combinations, novel and original instrumental effects, a regard for concise and agreeable proportion in the movements, a jealous control of melodic extent and propriety—indeed, such a general remodeling of accepted style and method as made his operas quite unique in the order of French lyric music. It is not surprising that to Gaul and Italian they failed to serve as models. Of a mixed mould, Cherubini's operas belong not to the French nor to the Italian school; indeed, as regards this latter their composer deviates to the utmost from the accepted Italian style of his day. So far as Cherubini's influence goes, little of this accrues at present from his dramatic music. The final judgment upon it has yet to be made. It is by no means improbable that when the suspended verdict is given upon such soundly constituted art work it will be the unqualified approval of a later posterity at such lofty and idealistic art as flowed from so pure and fresh a source.

CHURCH MUSIC.

As a composer of Church music the name of Cherubini stands out in striking relief. Throughout music's growth sacred art has been at once both the greatest aspect and noblest medium of musical expression. The mind needs only to dwell for a while upon the vast number of rich and glorious scores of a religious vein—and, if possible, to imagine the world without all such reverent art—to arrive at an adequate estimate of its worth either as an aid and stimulant to devotion, or as music per se.

In the slow but sure process by which the present age has become enriched by this precious bequest of sacred art, many notable names, from St. Ambrose to the Church musicians of to-day, come down to us. Chief among these stand those great tone poets—Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven—who all contributed largely to the Mass music of the Catholic Church. In his Masses Cherubini places himself upon an equality with these masters of the art, so that, while adding fresh jewels to an already rich treasury, he is enabled also to assert a just claim of place among the first rank of sacred musical writers.

The very qualities which barred the way to his acceptance as a successful dramatic composer were well calculated to aid Cherubini towards a great reputation in the field of sacred composition. His pure idealism and lofty tone and character; his profound learning and the constant expression he would give thereto; his chaste and classic melodic tendency; his thoroughly controlled passion and periods of powerful imagination—these were characteristics, natural or acquired, much more suited to the church than to the stage. Gifted as he was with the power of exciting emotion, he bridled this force in no unhesitating way, so that rarely in any of his works are to be found such periods of tremendous feeling and pathos as surround the character of Medée, in the powerful opera of that name. In his Church music he is serious, some say to dryness. His power of restraining his emotional capacity here stands him in great good stead. Remembering, too, his rich gift of melody, one he refused to give way to even in secular music, there is in these sacred works a remarkable absence of all but the most legitimate musical material as a means to the end desired. Thus the consensus of opinion seems to favour the sacred rather than the secular music of Cherubini as the most valuable and characteristic portion of his art work. Before extending some remarks upon Cherubini's sacred music—already touched upon in the earlier portion of this monograph—let us take a glance at Church musical art as it existed prior to Cherubini's contributions thereto.

Church music had had many a devotee, many a pious exponent before Cherubini aided its cause. In his own land there had lived, laboured, and died the grand procession of ancient classical composers, from Josquin des Prés, past Festa, Palestrina, Monteverde, and Carissimi, on to the pure school of Durante, Pergolesi, Leo, and more. No pupil had been better trained in the traditions of this old Italian church music style than was Cherubini; few students applied themselves with greater assiduity to the absorption of its overpowering properties than did he.

But this was not the species of sacred musical art which obtained in Italy in Cherubini's day. The sway of composers and people was towards an indulgence in melodic excess of the worst kind. Operatic flight, fancy, and rhythm—these barely sufficed to satisfy the craving of the intoxicated signori and lazzaroni alike for seductive and rapturous tune. Every organist and chapel-master was drawn into the stream, and priests and vocalists went with them. To construct church music to suit a taste of this kind was attended with no difficulty, and piles of so-called sacred music, surcharged with an abundance of theatrical melody, filled the service books, etc. Little of such has survived to indicate its tone and character, which is not to be wondered at nor to be deplored. In Rossini's Stabat Mater, first performed in 1842, the genius and taste of the age in the matter of religious music reached its culminating point, and it only needs the labours of a devout worshipper, Roman or Protestant, to examine the several numbers of this avowedly sacred composition, to arrive at an approximate idea of the ebb to which Ecclesiastical music had sunk in Italy.

In Germany Church music had long been triumphant, and Chorales, Motets, and Passion music—much of it tempered with the quaint severity of the old Netherlands school—were in existence to give tone and colouring to the Masses of Bach, and later on to those of Haydn and Mozart. The glorious contribution to sacred musical art, which the Haydn and Mozart Masses constitute, had been completed long before Cherubini devoted himself to religious music, but it is improbable that he was influenced in any way by its existence. As a student he probably knew little of such Masses, nor would they perhaps have been an open book to him at any time, unless they were contained in the library of the Conservatoire.

His notions, then, concerning Church music may be accepted as exclusively his own.

Cherubini's Church music stands a great rebuke to the array of church musicians of Italy, as well as of France, who from the middle of the Eighteenth century seem to have become lost to all remembrance of the lofty grandeur and nobility of style bequeathed them by Carissimi, Palestrina, Scarlatti, Leo, Durante, and Jomelli. Trained in Italy, Cherubini witnessed the latest art tendencies. He could see music, whether for church or stage, drifting into a channel of mere melodic display. In the former in particular, masses, requiems, motets, and occasional pieces for the most solemn moments in the service were made vehicles for the display of tunes and rhythms barely creditable as canal songs or ditties for the osterie.

No doubt whatever exists as to the reality of Cherubini's services to music for the Church. His elevated temperament, his love of purity in art, his great mastery over contrapuntal form and device, his sympathy with the old Italian church composers, all qualified him for the task of composing music which should not only ennoble and remodel a degraded taste, but also supplant an unworthy art-form in the highest service in which it is possible for music to be employed. But, given his example, and his value as a model—the importance of which to the cause of art evangelization generally cannot be too highly estimated—there yet remains the question—did he, or did he not, found a school of sacred music for France or any other country? The answer must be made in the negative. Acquainted as he was with the works of the old Italian church composers, imbued as he also was with a high sense of the dignity and purity of style which music for the altar should possess, this led him no farther than to the composition of sacred music, which will serve for all time and ages as samples of what Church music should be in colour, sentiment, and construction. Low as was the ebb of Church music throughout the dioceses of France during this composer's lifetime, still worse as it was and has since remained to this day in Italy, no band of young composers flocked to the new standard, so that to-day Cherubini stands little more than the noblest and purest Italian musical model which the Roman Church has possessed since the age of Palestrina and of Allegri before him. The Roman Church, like the Anglican, is not advancing musically, and few new scores, meritorious or otherwise, help to swell the lists of Mass and Motet to which the great sons of art have contributed so liberally. It is to be regretted that this question of supply will not apply to the Anglican Church. In this case much new music is hourly composed and published, but little of it deserves the name of sacred music when placed beside the compositions of Croft, Purcell, and Wesley. When, however, a new son of art does arise to embellish the Roman Church service with fit music, let him follow in the footsteps of Cherubini rather than those of Rossini. Emulating the pure grace and chaste style of the former, such a one will then add an ennobling element to the cause of Religion, he will be making a worthy offering to his Church.

AS A TEACHER.

As a Teacher, Cherubini exercised much immediate bearing. In the case of the pre-eminently great musicians, they for the most part lived and worked amid the surroundings of their homes and lodgings. Now and then a digressive spirit like Schubert found not a few of his noblest inspirations amid the freer air of the bier-garten. One and all, however, were indirect preceptors, who taught the world through their works rather than by word of mouth, and students of the art profit by their teachings just in so far as they possess and exercise the patience and the intelligence to fathom the mighty scores of a Mozart or Beethoven; thus to become acquainted with the great musical truths which such works contain.

Cherubini was otherwise. He was a direct teacher, and in his days many a scholar—the dull one and the brilliant—had the advantage of his personal advice and guidance. As Teacher, Examiner, and finally Director of the Paris Conservatoire many students came under his notice, and remembering the great theorist's love for his art, his earnest purpose, and sound musical teaching, it becomes impossible to estimate too highly either the extent or value of his instruction.

If pupils like Auber, Halévy, Carafa, Zimmerman, Batton, and others whose names might well be perpetuated, caught something of his healthy vein, then the unseen sway of the master may really be more than it will ever be possible accurately to gauge. Thus much for those who came under his influence during his lifetime.

There remains, however, that wider world of learners to whom he spoke, and continues to speak, in direct personal language. All theorists of music since his day are under obligation to him, and there is probably no student of Harmony and Composition, who has not met, and become indebted to, the valuable Treatise on "Counterpoint and Fugue" which Cherubini published in 1835, and which has more than once been translated into English. It proves its author to have been a perfect master of technical detail, and Cherubini would have served the Conservatoire well had he bequeathed it nothing more than this work and the other numerous exercises he wrote for the benefit of its scholars.

This work still remains a standard text book, and has, no doubt, served as a model for every similar course or treatise upon the same subject published since.

It is as a great exemplar in musical art that Cherubini may best be regarded. He stands at once a model reformer and teacher, one who had discovered for himself the doctrine of purity and depth in art, and was determined to promulgate his views. It was no new teaching, for the fathers of the ancient Italian Church style had passed away impregnated with it; nor was it a theory having for its effect the undermining of the foundations of true art. Cherubini was no heresiarch. Rather than pull down the structure of music he would prop it up with all the support of weighty foundation, in the shape of material upon which a so grand and ever-increasing edifice could rest. Surface matter, triviality in melodic skip and unctuous progression, superficiality in place of depth and learning, these were ominous indications to him of a diseased art tendency. To stem this, so far as he could, became his mission; and the sight of the great man, lost to personal ambition and aim, battling against the elements which jeopardized his art is no ignoble one. He was no melody-monger, nor throughout his works can he be traced pandering to the popular clamour for tune. His polyphonic writing is always consistent and remarkably grand. The sound early training he received from Sarti stood him in good stead throughout all his long after career. Unless it be Mendelssohn, no composer has surpassed Cherubini in his broad and grand style. His muse, deliberately a severe one, is always clear and well-defined. His vast theoretical capacity never escapes notice, and he worthily ranks with those masters of counterpoint who have combined great genius with a profound study of contrapuntal art. Like Bach, Handel, Mozart, and other notable contrapuntists, however, his scores frequently exhibit instances of how even the severest laws of counterpoint may be broken, and this with beneficial, often very happy, result. With all his learning, Cherubini is always perfectly understandable, and if his music cannot by all be regarded as consistently enjoyable, it can be asserted of it that it never fails to arrest the attention of even the careless listener; while to the true musician and man of understanding and culture it commands immediate admiration, and is at once a source of pleasure to the ear, and an intellectual treat to the mind. Throughout all his works his sense of music's real end and purpose is apparent. Gluck was the founder and teacher of the religion of dramatic truth. Then followed Beethoven and Cherubini—great apostles of Gluck—the former, in his Fidelio, accentuating the new teaching; and Cherubini, notably in his operas, carrying the doctrine into far wider-reaching territories. Depth of feeling, earnestness of thought and purpose—in fact all inner emotion find expression in Beethoven and Cherubini in a much more marked style than as enunciated by Gluck or Mozart. It does not lessen the value of such model teaching and example because so little of it has been adopted. It exists in example for all time. In Cherubini's day Italian dramatic music promised to develop into little more than an exuberant melodic overgrowth. The deeper and secret veins of musical expression were promising to become lost, and probably would have been, but for the noble creations that emanated from the master musicians just enumerated—composers who have given to the world scores which must ever remain unassailable and unsurpassable, because they are composed of the indestructible elements of musical scholarship, and earnest emotional truth and expression.

We shall do well to forget Cherubini as one who affected the music of his own, or the present, day to any appreciable extent; not thinking of him either as the founder of any school. Another generation may look back upon a resuscitation of his works, sacred and secular, and profit by his magnificent services to art.

This experience belongs not to us. We tack ^{to} closely upon his life and surroundings to judge of his ultimate bearing upon music. We do know, however, that he had few, if any, followers to carry on his work, and therefore, whatever bearing upon future art is to be his, must depend upon the persistency with which present-day students apply themselves to his scores and adopt the sound art principles upon which he worked. He stands the great philosopher of modern musical art. Contrasted with all other composers he occupies quite a unique position. He travelled a long way towards being on a level with Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendel-sohn, but he cannot seriously be ranked with these great tone poets. His power seems to be of most magnitude when we look upon him as a great example and model: then his influencing force is always more objective than reflective. He is something of a beacon—warning musical workers of all times from the rocks and shoals of the tawdry and trivial in art. More good, it might be maintained, has been, and perhaps will be, done by his example than has been accomplished by his scores. The result should be none the less sure, for though unwilling scholars may hesitate to emulate him in depth of study and profundity of learning—Cherubini is always with us as a permanent ideal for all who aim at purity in art, combined with dignity and originality.

Much has been said and written concerning the lasting properties of Cherubini's muse, and not a few point the finger of scorn to the measure of appreciation extended nowadays to it. It must be admitted that Cherubini's music is not altogether in fashion—at any rate in England—and that in concert programmes of every kind it is rare to find items from the pen of this classic musician. But much the same fate has attended other great masters of the art, and many instances could be cited where a composer and his works have been neglected for years and years after his lifetime—only to be one day resuscitated to the delight of an enlightened age, and to the end of the permanent endorsement of a deserving name on the scroll of enduring fame. For the season there is no great demand for Cherubini's music. His operas are rarely given, and little of his instrumental music is heard. Consequently, beyond his Overtures, and the performance of one of his Masses occasionally, Cherubini is an unknown quantity to the rising generation of musicians. It is not improbable, however, that a reaction may set in at no distant season in favour of Cherubini, and that his scores, sacred and secular, may be as sought after as they are now neglected. It must not be forgotten that his writings are based upon the sure foundation of sound art principle, and strictly legitimate musical aim and purport. He has left many—very many—scores which can well preserve his fame; but it would be difficult in this day to predict with safety as to whether his dramatic or sacred music will find most favour with a generation to come. Much of this result must depend upon the turn which social, political, and religious events may take after our lifetimes. Undeniably his principal Operas, his important Masses, the Overtures, and a few minor pieces deserve the title of great and masterly music, and the world's repertoire of finest music would remain singularly incomplete without such compositions. The Masses and Requiems especially go far to place Cherubini in the front rank of musical master minds. It is to be regretted that the extreme length of the best of these precludes their frequent performance in churches; but so it is at Roman Catholic as well as Protestant churches nowadays—the disposition to devote much time to devotional matters is becoming marked by a grudging rather than generous spirit, consequently opportunities for hearing such sublime Church music—under suitable conditions—are becoming more and more rare.

All summed up, then, the influence of Cherubini, either through his sacred or secular music, is singularly undetermined. It cannot be denied that the world of music—composers, performers, and listeners—all admire his high and lofty vein of style; and when his noble music is listened to, all become impressed and delighted with its ideal beauty and noble sentiment. Here matters end. They do not retire to their closets and imitate him in melodic turn and harmonic combination after the same fashion that hosts of workers have imitated Mendelssohn. What lump of creative art talent in any country has Cherubini leavened? No! his works and style lack qualities which find imitators, of which by the way there are always enough when there is a fruitful field for the imitative capacity. Did his scores possess the immediate properties which have brought the music of many other great composers into every home and every heart, a readier popularity would have awaited Cherubini in his own day. As it is, much that is grand, beautiful, and unimpressible (only because it lies so low from the surface) in Cherubini's music will remain, perhaps for an age, the portion only of the inquiring and thoughtful musician. The art of the universe will become but slowly permeated by its influence; but it is not too much to predict that truth, as Cherubini has written it, will in the end prevail, and that the sound principles upon which he worked, and the high ideal which was his, will ultimately meet with the approval of those minds most cultivated. Music has its evolutionary processes, and recognition of nobility in art must come even though it be long delayed. Cherubini rests for a season, the great preacher of purity in art, rather than an impressionist; but he will not have lived and worked in vain, if students emulate his classic idealism, his beautiful part writing, his masterly contrapuntal facility, his chaste melodic interpretation, his complete freedom from mannerism, his broad and masterly stroke, and above all his marked devotion and allegiance to art. A really great man, musically and morally, Cherubini stands out in bold relief amid a mass of musical contemporaries, and whatever may be the verdict of posterity regarding his influence upon art, no doubt can ever exist as to the calibre of his writings, which most emphatically stamp their originator as a truly great musician—one who just missed the highest reaches of highest art.

TEMPERAMENT AND DISPOSITION.

IN his temperament Cherubini was what school-girls term a Philistine. Doubtless he was a good husband and parent, but unfortunately for himself, and sometimes for others, he belonged to that class of men who can never get on with the world. He possessed an irritable and sensitive nature, he was cross-grained and crotchety, and while other people would appear to be gliding along smoothly and contentedly, Cherubini was everywhere meeting with friction. He lacked that rare quality—tact, and he seems to have been unaware of any solatium with which to charm away the petty annoyances of every-day life.

In some respects he deserves indulgence. Notwithstanding that he had done an immense amount of work—for Cherubini was a great worker—he remained very poor, only receiving regular emolument as a salaried professor at the Conservatoire. His operas had not been sufficiently successful to enrich their author, and a musical reputation only is not pre-eminent as a trusty prop when one is forced to mix constantly in the highest circles of any society, to say nothing of that of Paris. Croesus and Midas need to come by and lend a helping hand to the struggling genius bent on reform, or the dissemination of any new doctrine. He was evidently not born under a lucky star. Thus, when just making great headway in Vienna—whither the composer had gone in 1805, sick at heart with the state of affairs in Paris—it was unfortunate for him to encounter the man who of all others could thwart his purposes. Napoleon had marched to Vienna after his victory at Austerlitz, and, finding Cherubini there, ordered some music. “Since you are here, M. Cherubini, we will indulge in some music.” Thus was Cherubini forced to provide several concerts at Schönbrunn, where was the summer palace of the Emperor of Austria. And all this without reward such as other musicians of the French Court received!

Many men would have been guarded in face of so evident a disadvantage. Not so Cherubini. He elected to fall out with one whom it is only fair to admit could vie with him as a son of Mars if not as a devotee of Apollo, although Napoleon was really no bad judge of war music. “Your music is so noisy and complicated,” said the First Consul one day to Cherubini, “that I can make nothing of it.” The reply was tantamount to, “Excuse me if I don’t think it necessary to adapt my compositions to your brains!” and the reader will probably agree that if Napoleon had been a clown, instead of the first man in Europe, Cherubini could not have snubbed him more.

On another occasion the great general told Cherubini to his face that his music was too learned and too German, that in preference to it he liked the strains of Paisiello and Zingarelli, for which criticism Cherubini continued sullen and ungracious towards the Consul. Napoleon, in fact, took every opportunity to blunt the enthusiasm and efforts of Cherubini. ~~The~~ students of the Conservatoire once bore part of some obloquy. Napoleon having returned victorious from the Second Campaign, the students begged the General to grant them permission to perform a Festival Cantata and a Marche Funèbre by the master. The soldier overlooked the request!

As is so often the case with men tempered and constituted as was Cherubini, his own experience did not leave him more considerate towards others, and it is not libelling him to say that those who happened to be under his control, say at the Conservatoire, seldom had a good word for him. The only exception probably was in the case of any promising and highly talented pupil, such as Halévy, or Adam, or Boieldieu. "He was only rough outwardly," we are told, but it is unfortunate for his reputation that his worst points, his uneven temper, his irritable manner, his brusqueness, independence, obstinacy, his critical severity, his satire, reserve, and general dissatisfaction were the first qualities to show themselves, and which had first to be surmounted ere any ordinary mortal could hope to gain the good grace and interest of the presiding genius.

"The independence of character," says a great critic, "which Cherubini possessed, rendered him a subject of terror to all who came in contact with him; the musician who had taunted Napoleon in smart repartee was not likely to be very conciliatory to inferiorities and mediocrities." As a set-off to this, there is the testimony of a writer in the Harmonicon—a defunct periodical, far superior in its literary-musical contents and critical acumen to any publication of the present day, -wherein it is stated that "Cherubini had the happy art of gaining over the singers to his views by a suavity of manner and a conciliatory mode of address not always possessed by one of his talent and profession." This, however, was as early in his career as 1789, when he was Director of the Comte de Provence's troupe of Bouffons, and before he had become soured by some of his mundane experiences.

To tell all the stories concerning Cherubini's strange character would be out of place here; but it is impossible to forget Mendelssohn's description of the unpolished man as "a burnt-out volcano, all covered with stones and ashes;" or Berlioz's amusing story of an eruption of this Vesuvius.

Cherubini had assumed the Directorship of the Paris Conservatoire in 1822. The proverbial new broom did its work, and many supposed abuses, tolerated under the rule of his predecessor Perne, were disputed, and disposed of accordingly.

Among other things it was forbidden to students of both sexes to enter the school by the same door. Berlioz (who entered the Conservatoire four years later than Cherubini) also bore a terrible character for turbulency, and determined that he would set the above regulations at naught. Going one morning to the library, and pretending ignorance of this rule, he (Berlioz) entered by the door in the Rue Bergère, assigned to the lady pupils. He had scarcely reached the library door before he was stopped by a servant, who told him to go out and return to the same spot by another entrance. This was ridiculous, and Berlioz refused to comply. The serciteur made his way to Cherubini's room, and acquainted him with the matter. Berlioz meanwhile had secured a score of Gluck's "Alceste," and was absorbed in it, little dreaming that any further notice would be taken of his innovation. Cherubini entered the library looking more cadaverous than usual. "After passing several students at the table," says Berlioz, "the servant lighted before me, and cried 'Le Voilà !' On recognizing me, Cherubini snorted with rage. 'It's you, is it? O'est vous qui entrez par la porte, que'—que'—que' ze' ne veux, pas qu'on passe !' he continued with his comical Italian accent.

"'Sir,' I replied, 'I did not know of your order; another time I will take care to conform to it!'

"'Une autre fois ! une autre fois ! Que'—que'—que' venez-vous faire ici ?'

"'You see my reason for being here,' replied Berlioz, as he pointed to the volume before him, 'I come here to study Gluck's scores, and I have no need of any one's permission to do that. The library is public from ten till three. I have a right to make use of it.

"'Th—th—the right?'

"'Yes!'

"'You shall not come here again. Comment vous appelez-vous ?' cried Cherubini, trembling with rage, and I in my turn answered, 'You shan't know it!'

"'Arrête, a—a—arrête le, Hottin !' shouted Cherubini; 'que'—que' ze' le' fasse zeter en prison !' whereupon the two gave chase round the table without succeeding in catching me. I put an end to the scene by taking flight, shouting as I went that the intolerable Cherubini should neither have me nor my name, and that I would soon return to study the scores."

Again, in the case of Beethoven the composer of Medée was not slow to complain of that very characteristic which was so strikingly marked by its absence in himself. 'Il était toujours brusque,' was his invariable comment and reflection upon the character and disposition of Beethoven. Cherubini, however, allowed no impression of this kind to prejudice his unbounded admiration for the compositions of this king among orchestral composers.

The name of Cherubini is surrounded with a fund of anecdote—some of it complimentary and creditable, not a little the reverse. How much of it is true it is hard to decide. All that can be said is that many of the stories concerning him have been on dits in their day, and are as true as on dits in general. With this provision the reader may be tempted to linger over a few such, characteristic as they are of the man, and furnishing as they do a glimpse of his natural disposition. Some of them fully bear out the reputation which Cherubini has gained for being a sour, cross-grained old gentleman. Others are the direct opposite in drift and character, and point to quite a genial and considerate disposition on the part of the great theorist. How gratefully Spohr writes of the reception which Cherubini accorded to him and his compositions! Here are the words of the composer of the Die Weihe der Töne symphony:—

"From the frequent opportunities I had of playing before Cherubini at private parties, I conceived a very ardent desire to have all my quartets and quintets, so far as I thought them worthy of it, heard by that by me highly esteemed master, and to introduce them by degrees to his notice, in order to ask his opinion of them. But in this I succeeded with very few only, for when Cherubini had heard the first quartet (it was Nr. 1 of the Op. 45 written at Frankfort), and I was on the point of producing a second, he protested against it, and said: 'Your music, and indeed the form and style of this kind of music, is yet so foreign to me, that I cannot find myself immediately at home with it, nor follow it properly; I would therefore much prefer that you repeated the quartet you have just played!' I was very much astonished at this remark, and did not understand it until I afterwards ascertained that Cherubini was quite unacquainted with the German masterpieces of this kind of Mozart and Beethoven, and at the utmost had once heard a quartet by Haydn at Baillot's soirées. As the other persons present coincided with Cherubini's wish, I consented the more readily, as in the first execution of it some things had not gone altogether well. He now spoke very favourably of my composition, praised its form, its thematic working out, the rich change in the harmonies, and particularly the fugato in the last subject. But as there were still many things not quite clear to him in the music, he begged me to repeat it a second time, when we should next meet.

"I hoped he would think nothing more about it, and therefore at the next music party brought forward another quartet. Before I could begin, however, Cherubini renewed his request, and I was therefore obliged to play the same quartet a third time.

"The same thing occurred also with Nr. 2 of Op. 45, excepting that he spoke of it with more decisive praise, and said of the adagio: 'It is the finest I ever heard.' He was equally pleased with my pianoforte quintet with the concerted accompaniment of wind instruments, and I was frequently obliged to play it on that account."

That he could be just and generous towards a brother artist—not always an easy matter—is seen in the following:—

A pedant once went to Cherubini complaining of a flagrant fault in the novel chromatic progression from F sharp to F natural in the well-known Dal tuo Stellato in Rossini's Mosè in Egitto. Thus:—

"What do you say to such a libertine's act?" inquired the pedant.

"What do I say to it!" exclaimed Cherubini "why, I am only sorry I was not its perpetrator."

Like all truly great men, too, Cherubini could see merit in his compeers. A joyous student once came to him full of a certain performance of one of Beethoven's symphonies. Cherubini rejoined, "Young man, let your sympathies be first turned to the creative, and be less anxious about the executive in art:

accept the interpretation and ponder over the creation of those wonderful compositions, which are written for all time and for the imitation and criticism of all nations."

It was Cherubini's judgment and encouragement which led the father of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy to decide upon music as a profession for the youth, who, not long afterwards, surprised the world with that wonderful example of juvenile capacity, the Overture to "The Midsummer Night's Dream." In 1825, Mendelssohn being 16, the father took the boy to Paris to consult Cherubini. Under the lad's arm was the B minor Quartet for strings. Cherubini said, "Le garçon est riche, il fera bien, il fait même déjà bien."

Cherubini possessed a wonderful aptitude for saying smart things. Sometimes there was sting in them, at others they were harmless enough.

One day he was confronted by one of those bores of humanity who are incapable of directing their own rudder of life, and who constantly want the advice of other people as to the best course they should take. It was a certain French singer with a tremendous voice, but who could not decide the line of art for which he was best fitted. Cherubini begged him to sing. Vocalist opened his mouth, and the foundations well-nigh trembled with the bellowing.

"What shall I become?" said Furioso when he had finished.

"An auctioneer," replied Cherubini.

Upon another occasion a friend presented himself before the master with a score said to be Méhul's.

After examining it, Cherubini remarked, "It is not Méhul's, it's too bad to be his."

"Will you believe me, M. Cherubini, if I tell you it is mine?" said the visitor.

"No! It is too good to be yours!"

An instance of his frank criticism was provided when Beethoven's Fidelio was first performed at the Karnthnertor Theatre, Vienna. Cherubini was present. At the conclusion of the performance he was asked how he liked the Overture, the "Leonora in C." "Well," said he, "to be honest, I must confess that I could not tell what key it was in from beginning to end."

That such criticism was prompted by no base motives may be gathered when we remember the estimate he put upon the genius and work of the composer of the "Choral" Symphony. He accounted himself as nothing to a Beethoven. At a certain concert he once found in his hand a programme in which was inserted, sandwich-like, one of his own overtures—that to L'Hôtellerie Portugaise—between two compositions by Beethoven. Noticing the dangerous proximity, Cherubini remarked to a friend, "Look here, and see what they have done. I'm going to appear a very small boy."

He was strongly opposed to ill-deserved success—as he had reason to be, seeing how favours and honours had been showered upon less deserving musicians than himself at the French Court—while he long remained with little more than a bare subsistence. 'Malheureux! are you not ashamed of such undeserved success?" In such terms did Cherubini accost Boieldieu after one of the performances of the Calife de Bagdad at the Feydeau Théâtre; which brusque admonition Boieldieu took so much to heart, that he did not attempt another opera for three years, during which period he received the advantage of training from Cherubini, and then produced Ma Tante Aurore with extraordinary success.

It was Cherubini who has furnished us with one of the best solutions yet propounded to that serious problem for thoughtful minds—how to keep one's umbrella. One day he was walking along a boulevard when it began to rain. A gentleman, recognizing the maestro, pulled up his horse, and begged that Cherubini would take the reins and drive home quickly out of the rain. He could not accompany him, as he was going in a contrary direction, but he proposed borrowing the composer's umbrella.

"No, I never lend my umbrella," was the abrupt reply, and, whatever we may think of the courtesy, there can be no doubt about the prudence of the musician.

Cherubini was generally esteemed a great talker, but withal he could make good use of the golden quality of silence, especially if the topic under consideration was not commending itself to him.

His favourite pupil, Halévy, one day invited the master to the theatre to hear a new opera which Halévy had composed. At the end of the first act its composer asked Cherubini how he liked it. No reply. With the second act completed, the question was again put. No reply. Halévy warmed. "Vous ne me répondez point," he exclaimed. Still no reply. Halévy jumped up exasperated, and left the box!

Professor John Ella, in his charming "Musical Sketches," tells the following of Cherubini:—

This learned maestro, more renowned for his wit than for his sensibility, on meeting Tulou the flautist, returning from the funeral of the oboe-player, Brod, was thus addressed:—

"Ah! maestro, we have lost our dear friend Brod."

Cherubini, who was deaf, exclaimed, "What! what!! what!!!"

Tulou repeated with a loud voice, "Brod is dead!"

"Ah!" said the stoic Cherubini, turning away, "Petit son, petit son!" (little tone).

It is to be feared that the master was more intent at the moment upon differing with Tulou himself, for although Brod's tune was not loud, his taste and intelligence placed him in the highest rank of executants, and Cherubini must have been sensible of this. The flute was never a favourite instrument with the great theorist, and one day he was even heard to exclaim in disgust, "The only thing worse than one flute is two."

Ella vouches, too, for the following incident, which goes to prove that Cherubini could at times exercise that demonstrative kindness characteristic of his countrymen:—

Having composed an Offertorium for a grand public religious festival, Cherubini was informed on the eve of its performance of the sudden illness of the principal tenor vocalist. Early next morning the invalid's part was sent to young Begrez, with a request that he would study the music, and sing it before noon at the place appointed. In vain did violinist and amateur vocalist plead inability, Cherubini was peremptory, and assured the debütant that he had the greatest confidence in his musical intelligence. At the performance the admirable singing of Begrez produced a deep impression, and at the end of the service the illustrious Cherubini rushed to the front of the choir, and cordially embraced him in the presence of the whole congregation. After this Begrez placed his violin aside, took to singing, and became a successful vocalist.

Not always did Cherubini have matters his own way. His residence in Paris covered one of those stormy times which at different periods have swept over the fair capital. In the revolutionary days of 1792 the quiet and peaceably-disposed citizen hesitated to venture in the streets by day or night. Cherubini hazarded the risky and perilous experiment, with the result that he had perforce to submit to become the principal figure in a practical illustration of the saying, “A fiddler in spite of himself!”

Once, writes Mr. Bellasis in his “Memorials of Cherubini”:—

“During an occasion of more than ordinary excitement, Cherubini fell into the hands of a band of sans-culottes who were roving about the city seeking musicians to conduct their chants. To them it was a special satisfaction to compel the talent that had formerly delighted royalty and nobility to minister now to their own gratification. On Cherubini firmly refusing to lead them, a low murmur ran through the crowd, and the fatal words 'The Royalist! the Royalist!' resounded on all sides.

"At this critical juncture, one of Cherubini's friends, a kidnapped musician too, seeing his imminent danger, thrust a violin into his unwilling hands, and succeeded in persuading him to lead the mob. The whole day these two musicians accompanied the hoarse and overpowering yells of that revolutionary assemblage, and when at last a halt was made in a public square, where a banquet took place, Cherubini and his friend had to mount some empty barrels, and play till the feasting was over." This was in 1794.

As a man and a musician one turns from the consideration of Cherubini's life with regret, for there is a wholesome atmosphere of honesty about his purpose and career which is no less refreshing than are the pure and lofty strains of music which stream so bountifully from their chaste source. Music such as Cherubini's must always be cherished by the student because of the purity of the element of which it is composed, and it can always be resorted to when with senses jaded with harmonic luxuriance and sickly melodic sentiment, the better nature is struggling for some healthier region of artistic experience and realization.

CATALOGUE OF CHERUBINI'S WORKS.

VOCAL COMPOSITIONS.

COMPOSITION.	DESCRIPTION.	COMPOSED.
--------------	--------------	-----------

CANTATAS: 11 in all.

1.	La Publica Felicità	1774
2.	Amphion	1786
3.	Circe	1789
4.	Clytemnestre	1794
5.	Pour la Goguette	1812
6.	Louis XVIII. Fête	1814
7.	City of Paris Fête	1814
8.	Inno alla Primavera	1815
9.	Royal Guard Banquet	1816
10.	Le Mariage de Solomon	1816
11.	Hôtel de Ville Fête	1821

CREDOS: Detached.

1.	Credo, for eight voices and organ	1806
2.	Credo, in D, 4 parts	1816

MADRIGALS.

1.	Ninfa Crudele , five voices	1783
2.	four „	1811

MASSSES: 11 in all.

1.	Mass, in D, four voices	1773
2.	Mass, in C „ „	1774
3.	Mass, in C „ „	1775
4.	Mass, in F, three „	1808

COMPOSITION.	DESCRIPTION.	COMPOSED.
5.	Mass, in D minor, four voices ...	1811
6.	Mass, in C, four voices ...	1816
7.	Mass, in E♭ „ „ ...	1816
8.	Mass, in E „ „ ...	1818
9.	Mass, in G „ „ ...	1819
10.	Mass, in B♭ „ „ ...	1821
11.	Mass, in A, three „ ...	1825
MASSES, REQUIEM.
1.	C minor, four voices ...	1816
2.	D minor, three „ ...	1836
MOTETS : 7 in all.
1.	Motet, four voices ...	1777
2.	Motet, with solo for Marchesi ...	1781
3.	Motet, Nemo Gaudeat ...	1781
4.	Motet, Septuagesima Sunday ...	1818
5.	Motet, Lætare Jerusalem ...	1823
6.	Motet, Sciant Gentes ...	1829
ODES : 4.
1.	18th Fructidor (Poignards) ...	1797
2-3.	Anacréon Odes... ..	1799
4.	Emperor Napoleon's Marriage ...	1810
OPERAS : 25 in all.
1.	Il Quinto Fabio , No. 1 ...	1780
2.	Armida	1782
3.	Adriano in Siria	1782
4.	Il Messenzio	1782
5.	Il Quinto Fabio , No. 2 ...	1783
6.	Lo Sposo di Tre Marito di Nessuna ...	1783
7.	L'Idalide	1784
8.	L'Alessandro Nell' Indie	1784
9.	La Finta Principessa	1785
10.	Il Giulio Sabino	1786
11.	Ifigenia in Aulide	1788
12.	Démophon	1788
13.	Lodoïska	1791
14.	Kourkourgi	1793

COMPOSITION.	DESCRIPTION.	COMPOSED.
15. Elisa	1794
16. Medée	1797
17. L'Hôtellerie Portugaise	1798
18. La Punition	1799
19. Les Deux Journées	1800
20. Anacréon	1803
21. Faniska	1806
22. Pimmalion	1809
23. Le Crescendo	1810
24. Les Abencérages	1813
25. Ali Baba	1833

PSALMS, 3, including—

1. Dixit , four voices	1774
2. Dixit , Solo and Chorus	1775

The above are the principal vocal works. In addition, Cherubini composed at different times a large number of lesser vocal compositions, notably the following:—

Agnus Dei, 2.

Airs (Detached Pieces), 62.

Album Pieces, 2.

Antiphons, 20.

Ariettas, 3.

Chansonette 1834

Canons, 1 set, two, three, four voices; 5 detached ... 1807

Duets, 14.

Introits 1824

Kyries, 14.

Lamentations, 2, two voices... .. 1776

Litanies, 4, four voices 1779

Latin Words, Settings of, four voices.

Latin Hymns, various.

Magnificat, four voices 1775

Oratorio (without title) 1777

Pasticcio, "Epicure" 1800

La Prisonnière 1799

COMPOSITION.	DESCRIPTION.	COMPOSED.
Quartets, 2.
Republican Hymns and Choruses.
Romances.
Sanctuses 3.
Solfeggi, 4 sets (160 in all).
Sextet, 1.
Te Deum, four voices	1777
Terzettos, 9.
War Songs, 2.

INSTRUMENTAL COMPOSITIONS.

MARCHES : 11 in all, including—

1.	March	(Night Patrol)	1806
2.	March	(General Hoche)...	1797
3.	March	(Republican)	1800
4.	March	(Baron Braun)	1805
5.	March	(Wind Instruments)	1808
6.	March	(Wind Instrument-)	1809
7.	March	(Wind Instruments)	1810
8.	March	(National Guard)...	1814
9.	March	(Funèbre)...	1820
10.	March	(Faniska)...	1831

MINUET, Full Score 1808

NOCTURNES : 6, for Piano 1782

OVERTURE, 1, in G, Full Orchestra... .. 1815

QUARTETS : 6 in all.

1.	Quartet, in E \flat	1814
2.	Quartet, in C	1829
3.	Quartet, in D minor	1834
4.	Quartet, in E	1835
5.	Quartet, in F	1835
6.	Quartet, in A minor	1837

QUINTET, in E minor 1837

SONATAS : 10 in all.

1.	Cylinder Organ	1805
2.	Cor Anglais and Piano	1804

SYMPHONY, Full Score 1815

Among the lesser Orchestral works are the following:—

COMPOSITION.	DESCRIPTION.					COMPOSED.
Ballet Music	"Achille d Scyros"					1804
Bassoon Pieces, 2	1818
Canzonet (Piano)	1782
Chaconne, Full Score	1785
Clavichord Sonatas, 6	1780
Clarionet Pieces, 2	1824
Country Dances, 6, Full Score	1808
" " 3 "	1809
Entr'actes, 2	Lodoïska					1805
Figured Bass Pieces (Piano)	1798
Hautboy Pieces, 2	1818
Intermezzi, 2.
Organ Sonata	1780
Pas Redoubles, 7	1814
Pianoforte Capriccio	1789
" Fantasia	1810
Pieces for Wind Instruments, 8	1814
Romances, 18 (Piano)	1787
Trios, 2 (Violin and Piano)	1793
" 2, Full Score	1810

In all Cherubini composed some 430 Pieces, nearly 100 of which have been published.

NOTE.—For distinguishing many of the above compositions a relative name or incident has here been associated with the scores.

INDEX.

A.

Académie de Musique, 32.
 Adam, 93.
Adriano in Siria, 5, 33.
 Agnesi, 26.
Agnus Dei of Mass in F, 47.
 „ of D minor Mass, 51.
Alceste, 95.
Ali Baba, 32, 33.
Allegri, 44, 82.
Ambrose, St., 78.
Anacréon, 26, 41.
Anecdotes of Cherubini, 96.
Angelo, Michael, 18, 44.
Anglican Church Music, 82.
Arditi, 17.
Armida, 5.
Auber, 6, 34, 37, 39, 83.

B.

BACH, 6, 80, 85.
 Baillot, 1, 97
 Baptism at St. John the Baptist
 Basilica, 1.
 Batton, 83.
 Bauermeister, 26.
 Beethoven, 15, 20, 28, 39, 46, 75,
 76, 78, 83, 86, 95-97, 98, 100.
 Begrez, 103.
 Bellasis, 27, 53, 57, 108.

Benedictus of D minor Mass, 51.
 Berlioz, 32, 54, 55, 71, 94, 95.
 Berton, 37.
 Bizarri, 2.
 Boieldieu, 6, 37, 39, 62, 93, 101.
 Bologna, Studying at, 3.
 Botanist, As a, 45.
Bouffons, Director of Troupe of,
 94.
 Bouilly, 20.
 Brod, 102.

C.

Calife de Bagdad, 101.
 Cambert, 70.
 Cantata—La Pubblica Felicità, 2.
 Carafa, 83.
 Carissimi, 44, 79, 81.
 Castrucci, 2.
 Catalogue of Compositions, 105.
 Catel, 62.
 Cecilia, St., 45.
 Charles X., 54, 55.
 Chevalier of the Legion d'Honneur, 66.
 Chimay, The guest of Prince de,
 44.
 "Choral" Symphony, 100.
 Chorley, 16-18.
 Church Music, Character of, 77;
 Italian, 80.

Church Music Style, 43.
 Clément, 5.
 Composer to King George III., 7.
 Compositions, Earliest, 2.
 Comte de Provence, 94.
Conservatoire de Musique founded, 65.
Coriolan Overture, 15.
 "Coronation" Mass, First, 53.
 " " " Second, 54.
Così fan Tutti Overture, 15.
 Costa, 26.
 "Counterpoint and Fugue" Treatise, 84.
Credo of D minor Mass, 50.
 " " Mass in F, 47.
 Crescentini, 5.
 Critics on I Due Giornate, 25.
 Cræsus, 91.
 Croft, 82.
Crucifixus of Mass in F, 47.

D.

Dal tuo Stellato, 98.
 Death of Boieldieu, 62.
 " Cherubini, 63.
De la Musique Religieuse, 54.
Démophon, 7-9, 36-38, 73, 77.
Der Wasserträger, 19.
Die Wiehe der Töne Symphony, 96.
 Director of the Paris Conservatoire, 67, 94.
Don Giovanni, 10, 30.
 Dramatic Career, Aspect of, 35.
 " Music, Influence upon, 69.
Durante, 4, 79, 81.

E.

EARLIEST Compositions, 2.
 Ecclesiastical Music, Italian, 80.
Eliza, 11.
Ella, 22, 102.
Esterhazy de Galanta, Prince, 48.
Eterno Idio, 30.
Exemplar, A great, 87.

F.

Faniska, 28, 31, 39.
 Fashion in Music, The, 88.
 Felici, Bartolomeo, 2.
 " Alessandro, 2.
Festa, 79.
Fétis on Démophon, 8, 9.
 " Italian sacred music, 44.
 " Les Deux Journées, 21.
Fidelio, 11, 76, 86, 100.
Flotow, 71.
 Flute, Opinion concerning the, 102.
 Francis Joseph II., 28-39.
 French Opera, Relationship to, 34.
 " Operatic Taste, 72.
 Foundation of Paris Conservatoire, 12.
 Founding of Conservatoire de Musique, 65.
 Funeral, Death and, 63.
 F. W. H., 32.

G.

GALLAND, 33.
 German Appreciation of Cherubini, 75.
Girod, 53, 54.
Gloria of Mass in D minor, 50.
 " of Mass in F, 47.
Gluck, 9, 10, 14, 16, 35, 36, 71, 86.
 Goethe, 20.
 Gounod, 71.
 Grétry, 37, 70.
 Grove on Medée Overture, Sir G., 15.
Günz, 18.

H.

HALÉVY, 2, 6, 35, 38, 71, 75, 93, 101, 102.
Hali Baba; ou, Les Quarante Voleurs, 32.
 Handel, 6, 42, 85.
 " Commemoration Festival, 7.
Harmonicon, 30, 98.

Haydn, 28, 39, 46, 76, 78, 80, 97.
Hebrides Overture, 15.
 Hoche, 63.
 Hoffmann, 14.

I.

I Due Giornate, 25.
Ifigenia in Aulide, 6.
Il Giulio Sabino, 7.
Il Messenzio, 5.
Il Portator d'Acqua, 20.
Il Quinto Fabio, 5, 3.
Il Trovatore, 19.
Incarnatus of D minor Mass, 50.
 " Mass in F, 47.
 Influence upon Church Music,
 77, 81.
 69, 74. " Dramatic Music,
 Inspector at Conservatoire de
Musique, 65.
Institut, Member of the, 66.
 Instrumentation for Singers, 40.
 "Israel in Egypt," 42.

J.

JOMELLI, 81.
 Josquin des Prés, 79.
 Jouy, 31.
 "Judas Maccabæus," 42.
 Judgment on Mendelsohn, 99.
 Juvenile Compositions, 2.

K

KARNTNERTHEATRE, 28.
 Kidnapped as a Royalist, 03
Kourkourgi, 32.
 Kyrie of Mass in D minor, 49.
 " " F, 45, 46.

L.

La Favorita, 40.
La Finta Principessa, 7.
L'Alessandro nell' Indie, 5.
La Pastorale, 70.
La Pubblica Felicità, 2.
La Punition, 19.
La Sonnambula, 19.

Lecocq, 71.
Le Crescendo, 31.
 Leo, 4, 79, 81.
 Léonard, 7.
Leonora Overture, 15, 100.
 Leopold II., 2.
Les Abencérages, 31, 35.
Les Deux Journées, 14, 19-22, 26,
 27, 37, 39, 41, 73, 75, 76.
 Lesueur, 35-37, 66, 67, 75.
L'Hôtel-rie Portugaise, 19. Overture to, 100.
L'Idalide, 5.
Litanie della Vergine, 48.
Lodoïska, 9-11, 37, 73, 77.
Lohengrin, 19.
 London, Reception in, 7.
 " Visits, 6.
 Longest Mass Score. The, 48.
Lo Sposo di Tre Femine, 5.
 Louis XIV., 70.
 Louis XVI., 38, 55.
 Louis XVIII., 53, 66.
 Lower Rhine Musical Festival,
 58.
 Lully, 70.
 Lyrical Purpos, 35.

M.

MALIBRAN, 18.
 Mapleson, 17.
 Marcello, 44.
 Marchesi, 7.
 Marie Antoinette, 7.
 Marmontel, 7.
 Marriage to Cécile Tourette, 12.
 Martini, 66.
 Mass in A, 46.
 " B flat, 54.
 " C (No. 6), 51.
 " C minor, Requiem, 46.
 " D minor, 48, 57.
 " E, 53.
 " E flat, 53.
 " F, 44, 46.
 " G, 53.
Ma Tante Aurore, 101.
 Mature Period, Cherubini's, 47.

Mazarin, Cardinal, 70.
Medée, 11, 14, 16, 19, 20, 37, 39,
 41, 46, 73, 75, 79, 96.
Méhul, 14, 35, 37, 75, 99.
Melusina Overture, 15.
 "Memorials of Cherubini," 27,
 53, 57, 103.
Mendelssohn, 15, 19, 22, 31, 58,
 85, 87, 89, 94, 99.
Mendouze, 27.
Metastasio, 7.
Meyerbeer, 37, 71, 74.
Midas, 91.
 "Midsummer Night's Dream"
Overture, 99.
 "Modern German Music," 16.
Monteverde, 79.
Mosè in Egitto, 98.
Mozart, 10, 37, 40, 74, 76, 78, 80,
 83, 85-87, 97.
 "Musical Sketches Abroad and at Home," 23.
Musique d'Effet, 37.

N.

NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE, 27, 31,
 42, 65, 92, 93.
Neiderrheinische Musik Zeitung,
 36.

O.

OFFENBACH, 71.
 Opera, Bearing upon French, 34.
 "Influence upon, 70, 74.
 Originality, Operatic, 76.
Overture in G, 67.
 "Leonora" in C, 100.
 "to Anacréon, 27, 41.
 " Démophon, 8.
 " Faniska, 29.
 " Les Absénceages, 31.
 " Les Deux Journées,
 22, 41.
 " Medée, 15, 41.
 " "Midsummer Night's Dream," 99.

P.

PAISIELLO, 92.
Palestrina, 4, 44, 69, 79, 81.

Papering the Pit, 32.
Pasta, 18.
Paul Veronese, 21.
Pedant, Rebuking a, 98.
Pergola Theatre, The, 1, 5.
Pergolesi, 79.
Perne, 94.
Philharmonic Society Engagement, 67.
Picchianti, 38, 43.
 " on Démophon, 36.
 " Sacred Music, 43.
Piccini, 71.
Pimmalione, 31.
Polyphonic writing, Cherubini's,
 85.
Precocity as a child, 1.
Prolificeness as a Composer, 61.
Purcell, 82.

Q.

"QUARTERLY MUSICAL MAGAZINE," 31.
Qui Tollis of D minor Mass, 50.
Quoniam of D minor Mass, 50.

R.

RAMEAU, 9, 70.
Raphael, 44.
Reforms, Gluck's Opera, 71.
Republican Song Settings, 63.
Requiem Mass in C minor, 46
 55-57.
 " Mass in D minor, 46, 56
Review of Dramatic Career, 34.
Richard Cœur de Lion, 11.
Rinaldini, 26.
Ritter, 21.
Romish Service, Compositions
 for, 42.
Rossini, 7, 27, 37, 40, 80, 98.
Roze, 26.

S.

SACRED Music Fame, 42.
 " Influence upon
 70.
Saint Cecilia, 45.

Sanctus of Mass in F, 47.
 Santley, 18.
 Sarti, 3, 4, 85.
 Scarlatti, 69, 81.
 Schluter, 21, 41.
 Schubert, 83.
 Scio, 12, 16.
 Score Copying, 3.
Soirées at Schönbrunn, 65.
 Spohr, 22, 96; Before Cherubini, 97.
 Spontini, 35, 75.
Stabat Mater, Rossini's, 80.
 St. Cyr, 13.
 Steibelt, 37.
 Stradella, 69.
 Style in Overtures, Evidence of, 41.
 „ Démophon, New, 36.
 Superintendent of King's Chapel, 52, 66.
 Symphonist, As a, 40.
 Symphony in D, 67.

T.

Tannhäuser, 19, 40.
 Teacher, As a, 83.
 Teachers, Earliest, 1.
 Temperament and Disposition, 91.
 Tietjens, 18, 26.

Tulou, 102.
 Turin, Reception in, 6.
 Tuscany, Grand Duke of, 2.

U.

UMBRELLA, How to keep an, 101.

V.

VERDI, 7, 40.
 Vienna, Visit to, 39.
 Viotti, 6.
 Vocal Aptness, 40.
 Vogel, 37.

W.

WAGNER, 38, 76.
 Wagnerian Operatic Theories, 76.
Wasserträger, Der, 75.
 Weber, 21, 22, 75.
 Wesley, 82.

Y.

YOUTH, As a, 3.

Z.

Zauberflöte Overture, 15.
 Zimmerman, 83.
 Zingarelli, 92.

